Social Shakespeare
Social Shakespeare

Aspects of Shakespearean Dramaturgy and Contemporary Society

Thesis submitted for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at the University of Leicester

by

Peter J Smith BA MA (Lancaster)
Department of English
University of Leicester

December 1992
Social Shakespeare

Aspects of Shakespearean Dramaturgy and Contemporary Society

Thesis submitted for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at the University of Leicester by Peter J Smith December 1992

'Social Shakespeare' is a contribution to the politicising process of Shakespearean studies which has occurred in the last ten years as a result of the increasing force of literary and cultural theory. The study aims at a distinct refocusing of political criticism upon the Shakespearean text as realised in performance.

The first part, 'Genre and Imagery', sets out the critical agenda and methodology and situates the study in relation to more traditional criticism in terms of the generic definitions of Comedy and Tragedy. It attempts a political reading of these 'literary' definitions by discussing their ideological context. The third chapter examines the epistemological uncertainties of the early modern period by examining the device of gendered landscape imagery.

Part Two, 'Dramaturgy and Language', reads specific plays in terms of this procedural explication. Chapter V explores the notion of drama occurring at the boundaries of the conscious and the unconscious mind. But it extends this idea by considering the manner in which private fantasy is appropriated and anticipated by certain ideological forces. The sixth chapter considers how a particular kind of speaking is politically subversive and thus how a linguistic, or a 'merely' formal, analysis is inseparable from social analysis.

The final part, 'Society and Culture', considers issues of anti-Semitism and homophobia in the light of historical circumstances and modern theatre practice. The final chapter discusses the cultural mythologising of the Bard principally by the state apparatuses of education and theatre.

The title of 'Social Shakespeare' alludes to Political Shakespeare edited by Jonathan Dollimore and Alan Sinfied (Manchester, 1985). 'Social Shakespeare' is designed to refine and promote the practice of political criticism while embarking on the broader study of Shakespearean drama in its fully social context.
Contents

Acknowledgements iii
A Note on the Texts iv
List of Plates v

I Introduction 1

Part One: Genre and Imagery

II Shakespeare's Comedy of Consensus 20

III The Flaw in the Flaw:
Shakespeare's Tragic Method and a Problem of Criticism 47

IV Sexual Geography of the Renaissance:
On the Imagery of Antony and Cleopatra 74

Part Two: Dramaturgy and Language

V Dreaming Drama and Dramatising Dreams:
Towards a Reading of Sexuality in Cymbeline 116

VI Re(-)fusing the Sign: Linguistic Ambiguity and the Subversion of Patriarchy in Romeo and Juliet and The Two Gentlemen of Verona 148

Part Three: Society and Culture

VII The Eternal Mushroom of Humanity: Racism and Jewishness
in The Jew of Malta and The Merchant of Venice 187

VIII Playing With Boys: Homosexualism and
All-Male Companies in Shakespearean Drama 230

IX Shakemyth: The Fabrication of Shakespearean Culture 279

Bibliography 307
Acknowledgements

The following have read and provided helpful comments on various chapters for which I am very grateful: Richard Allen Cave, Sandy Cunningham, Richard Dutton, Jean-Marie Maguin, William Myers, Simon Shepherd, Fiona Stafford, Ann Thompson, and Roger Warren. Tim Luscombe also provided me with valuable information especially in relation to chapter VIII.

Thanks are due to the following theatres and theatre companies for their assistance with picture research: Cheek by Jowl, English Shakespeare Company, Leicester Haymarket Theatre, RSC Barbican, and RSC Stratford. Thanks are also due to the Library of the Shakespeare Centre, Stratford upon Avon.

I am especially grateful to my supervisor, Greg Walker who commented on drafts with precision and alacrity and was always encouraging.
A Note on the Texts

A number of Renaissance works have been quoted from their original editions. Most of them are unavailable in modern spelling versions and I have chosen not to modernise them. Conversely, quotations from Shakespeare, Marlowe, Jonson etc., have usually been quoted in modern spelling from standard editions. One danger of this inconsistency is that it makes the lesser known writers look arcane and thus tends to harden canonical prejudice. The reader should be aware of this pitfall and I risk it only for ease of reference.

Unless otherwise stated, all quotations from Shakespeare are from The Complete Works, edited by Peter Alexander (London and Glasgow, 1951).
List of Plates

Following page 168

D. Saltcellar by Cellini.

H. Romeo and Juliet, dir. Terry Hands, RSC, 1989. L to R: Patrick Brennan (Benvolio), Mark Rylance (Romeo), David O'Hara (Mercutio).

N. As You Like It, dir. Declan Donnellan, Cheek by Jowl, 1991. Adrian Lester as Rosalind and Patrick Toomey as Orlando.

O. Troilus and Cressida, dir. Sam Mendes, RSC, 1990. Norman Rodway as Pandarus and Sally Dexter as Helen.

Introduction

I loved to see the Macbeths Jerseys knacking spots of the Plumpduffs Pants. ¹

'Romeo Romeo where for art thou Romeo?' ... 'Romeo Romeo were four ought though Romeo' ... 'rome oh rome wher for they romeo.' ²

In 1985, the year that I received my first degree, Political Shakespeare was published and since then Shakespeare studies have become increasingly politicised. ³ This study is itself a further contribution to that politicising process; but it is one which aims at a distinct refocussing of political criticism upon the Shakespearean text as realised in production. 'Social Shakespeare' embraces dramatic production as a site for interpretation rather than prioritising a fixed literary document.

The reasons for the increasingly urgent politicisation of Shakespeare studies in recent years are themselves worthy of analysis. The entrenchment of the right under Margaret Thatcher and Ronald Reagan in the major English-speaking countries of the world was met by the arrival and establishment, as tertiary lecturers, of those that had been educated during a period of oppositional politics throughout the sixties and seventies. In the United States the oppositional programme took the form of pacific, anti-Vietnam 'hippyism' while in Europe more visibly radical agendas were set by les Événements in Paris in the Spring of 1968. The students of this period have by now arrived in senior positions within intellectual communities both in Europe and the States and have effected a revolution in the study of cultural forms with obvious consequences for the discipline of English and especially Shakespeare.

The displacement of traditional critics by these 'children of the revolution', is usually greeted by the accusation that the study of artistic forms is being increasingly debased or sullied by the intrusion of politics. In terms of English studies generally, the contention is less pronounced than it was during the last decade. The victimisation of Colin MacCabe at Cambridge and David Craig at Lancaster was perhaps the first intimation of the struggle that was to come as the academy xenophobically resisted the 'immigration' of theoretical ideas from Europe. This struggle was still taking place during the mid-eighties when a number of Higher Education Teachers of English conferences generated particularly acerbic quarrels between the last of a species of English Men of Letters and the champions of the new theory.

Ironically, theory, which is usually perceived to be politically oppositional, has been assured of its place by recent reforms in Higher Education brought about by the Conservative party which has held office ever since the arrival of theory in the late seventies and early eighties. The transformation of polytechnics and colleges of Higher Education into new universities (which took effect from September 1992), puts their socially-informed and progressive predilections on an ostensibly equal footing with the scholarly traditionalism of the 'real' universities. Of course no-one who knows anything about H. E. could possibly believe that parity will result between ancient seats of learning and polys as a result of this cosmetic exercise. Yet John Major's fantasy of a 'classless society' is, we are assured, the reason that over fifty polytechnics have been allowed to alter their letter-heads. Despite their superior position, the traditional universities have been required to embrace theory to keep pace with the polys' penchant for theoretically informed courses such as media studies, film studies, popular culture, communications studies and so on. That Oxford's major tourist attraction, the Warton Professor of English Literature, was recently bought back from a job at Princeton, is a symptom of the rapprochement between the bastions of traditional scholasticism and theory. Theory, it seems, is here to stay.

---

Social Shakespeare: I

Despite the safe (albeit initially bumpy) landing of theory within British H. E., the struggle over its place in Shakespeare studies is far from over. The juxtaposition of potentially politically radical theoretical positions with the world's most well-established writer was bound to be uncomfortable. As Jean I. Marsden noted recently, 'Traditionally, Shakespeare criticism has studiously removed his works from any historical or political context apart from brief glances at the literary climate of the Renaissance.' This 6 It seems that employers are already alert to the spurious nature of the 'new' universities. A recent advertisement asked for 'Graduates with excellent degrees from good universities'. Some degrees are clearly more equal than others! (Cosmopolitan, September 1992. Thanks to Christine Burgass for bringing this to my attention.) In addition, the government itself is concerned about the failure of its grand scheme. 'Nigel Forman, the higher education minister warned vice-chancellors that they would have to justify the rising proportion of firsts and upper seconds to keep public credibility.' (The Guardian, 22 September 1992.) For the analogous situation in relation to the National Curriculum and John Pattem's attack on it, see chapter IX.

---

discomfort is typified by the latest public wrangle in the field between Richard Levin, a polemical defender of traditional approaches, and a whole gamut of more radical opponents. In PMLA, 104 (1989), no fewer than twenty-four academics signed a letter condemning Levin's paper in the previous number as embodying 'arbitrary selectivity, reductive thematizing, misplaced causality, unexamined and untenable assumptions about intentionality, irresponsible slippage from particulars to abstractions.' The letter concludes with the stinging paragraph:

We are puzzled and disturbed that Richard Levin has made a successful academic career by using the reductive techniques of this essay to bring the same predictable charges indiscriminately against all varieties of contemporary criticism. We wish to know why, in view of the energetic, cogent, sophisticated theoretical debate that is currently taking place within and among schools of Renaissance criticism, PMLA has chosen to print a tired, muddled, unsophisticated essay that is blind at once to the assumptions of feminist criticism of Shakespeare and to its own.

In the following year, a special number of New Literary History published an essay by Levin under the title 'Unthinkable thoughts in the New Historicizing of English Renaissance Drama'. Catherine Belsey's response followed in the same number, 'Richard Levin and In-different Reading'. In it she accuses Levin of basing part of his argument (about the 'unthinkability' of modern critical concepts in the early modern period) on a misreading of her influential book, Critical Practice. She asserts that his deployment of her arguments is 'particularly half-witted' and while 'I should be happy to have the debate ... he prefers to score easier points by inventing a much sillier statement

---

8 PMLA, 104 (1989), 77 - 78, p. 77.
9 Ibid., p. 78.
10 New Literary History, 21 (1990), 433 - 447.
11 Ibid., 449 - 456. Belsey was among the signatories of the PMLA letter the previous year.
and attributing it to me as a representative of the critical approach he deplores.' For Jonathan Dollimore, Levin is beneath contempt. In the same number of NLH he prefixed his essay with the note:

> This essay was prompted by an invitation from Ralph Cohen, editor of New Literary History, to reply to a critique of new historicism and cultural materialism by Richard Levin, to be published in the same issue of that journal. Nothing in Levin's article inspired me to take up this generous offer. However, I have been prompted to respond to three other critics.

The latest addition to the Levin controversy is a volume of over 300 pages entitled Shakespeare Left and Right in which Levin is uncomfortably closely bound with his main detractors. The tone of these essays is frequently vituperative. Levin is of course not alone in his condemnation of the new theoretical models, though he may be considered to be a good deal more (foolishly) brave than other less outspoken traditionalists. One less widely known but similarly conservative enemy of theory is Charles R. Forker who reserved his contempt for his review of Political Shakespeare itself:

> A monochrome high seriousness virtually annihilates all Shakespearean wit, charm, and sense of humour unless these can be harnessed vulgarly to some ulterior social moralism. Obsessive class- and gender-consciousness make for a kind of inverse snobbery.... Power and oppression become exclusively the theme. Implicit also in this school of academic discourse is the arrogant assumption that the interpretive act, if it can be sufficiently startling and revisionist, somehow displaces and ought to displace the work interpreted, even if

---

12 Ibid. p. 455.
14 Shakespeare Left and Right, edited by Ivo Kamps (New York and London, 1991).
Social Shakespeare: I

(or perhaps because) it comes from the pen of Western civilization's supreme literary genius.

For all its sophisticated expression, this remark asserts little more than 'theory takes the fun out of Shakespeare'. Despite the mystification of the humanist assumptions which underlie this critique, the charge is a serious one. Political Shakespeare is dourly unabashed about its own political agenda. In the foreword to the volume its editors sombrely assert that, 'Cultural materialism ... registers its commitment to the transformation of a social order which exploits people on grounds of race, gender and class.' Robert Weimann, by no means a 'traditionalist' in his own work, draws attention to the risk of sounding glumly pious or holier-than-thou: 'a politically committed criticism, would as a matter of course condemn itself to a grim kind of puritanism if the sheer element of fun, release, reckless enjoyment were ever minimized or, even, by implication, theoretically ostracized.' Nigel Wheale attributes the dehumanising tendency of cultural materialism to the theory's inability to account for subjectivity: 'It is at this point that we meet the major problem with cultural materialism: how does it articulate anyone's felt response to a text or production? ... how does cultural materialism deal with subjectivity itself?' While the title of 'Social Shakespeare' clearly alludes to that of Political Shakespeare, and while this allusion signifies the similarity of its political aspirations, it distinguishes itself from the latter study tonally, in its unembarrassed enthusiasm for the Shakespearean works which originally provided its impetus. In addition, its sustained examination of particular theatrical productions is designed to forestall the kind of critical objections which Wheale voices. Chapter IX in particular attempts to clear the plays from the charge of ideological hegemony by distinguishing them from their cultural mediation (which the chapter theorises as 'Shakemyth'). In this way the notion that any literature is \textit{a priori} politically partisan is refuted and the plays are shown potentially to be sites of intervention for a politics of either the Left or (more commonly) the Right.

---

16 Political Shakespeare, p. viii.
18 Nigel Wheale, Introduction to Shakespeare in the Changing Curriculum, 1 - 29, p. 25.

The dual project of \textit{Political Shakespeare} is signified in the book's structure. The anthology is divided into two parts. Part I ('Recovering history') re-reads the plays in the light of Renaissance history and society. Attention is focused on statecraft, family life, exploration, colonialism and other areas of debate current in Renaissance studies; these essays strive to make us Shakespeare's contemporaries. Part II ('Reproductions, interventions') reads Shakespeare in the light of his modern cultural mediations and reproductions. In Marxist terminology, Part I is directed towards the moment of production, and II to the moment(s) of consumption.

The subtitle of \textit{this} thesis ('Aspects of Shakespearean Dramaturgy and Contemporary Society') is designed to reproduce this double focus but, in addition, there is underpinning the enterprise a stress on the dialogic relationship between past and present; not in terms of a clumsy conflation of the two, erasing the distinctions between Shakespeare's period and our own, but rather in terms of an awareness of a modern historicity which, while it interrogates the ideology of the earlier period, acknowledges as inescapable its own ideological position and the historicity of its own insights. The 'Contemporary' of my subtitle, then, stands for both the sixteenth- and the twentieth-centuries, early modern and post-modern, and thus refutes the dichotomy of the too-neatly sectionalised \textit{Political Shakespeare}. Don E. Wayne has identified 'a noticeable lag between our ability to recognize the role of power in the plays and poems of Shakespeare ... and our ability to articulate the forms that power takes in our own historical moment.' 19 'Social Shakespeare' is designed to eradicate this lag.

In spite of the vehemence with which Political Shakespeare protests its political aspirations, the volume, as with much apparently oppositional criticism in the area, is frequently, surprisingly defeatist. For example, Sinfield's potent essay on 'Shakespeare and Education' ends with the humble admission that 'Teaching Shakespeare's plays and writing books about them is unlikely to bring down capitalism, but it is a point for intervention.' 20 Elsewhere, Ivo Kamps timidly confesses, 'The chances that a new reading of a Shakespeare play will noticeably affect our world are negligible.' 21 This submissiveness is the result in part of the recognition that Shakespeare criticism is not usually read outside of the academy and that it is immediately (along with all such critical work) the preserve of the elite. It is not likely that the cultural perceptions of literature will change significantly due to the publication of another academic volume. This situation is especially true in Shakespeare studies where the sheer number of new publications threatens each of them with overnight obsolescence. This humility seems widely felt at the moment especially in the United States and may be a symptom of the bludgeoning authority of the right over the last decade. Political disengagement is also likely to be a result of the inheritance of American New Criticism with its insistence on critical objectivity. Stephen Greenblatt for example, who coined the label 'new historicism' and is one of its most influential practitioners, eschews its political authority, 'as far as I can tell (and I should be the one to know) it's no doctrine at all.' 22 Walter

20 Political Shakespeare, p. 154.
21 Shakespeare Left and Right, p. 8.
Cohen attributes this acquiescence to a post-Vietnam disillusionment, noting what he describes as 'the strangely quietist feel of these radical critiques.'

'Social Shakespeare' is motivated by a discontent with this kind of political resignation. In part it accepts the pessimistic view of the relative impotence of scholarly books to alter society constructively. However, this study sites the political force of the plays that it explores in the theatre rather than on the printed page, accepting and acting upon a discontent with the shortcomings of much contemporary criticism noted by Jean E. Howard: 'I think it is a mistake to restrict our considerations of the ideological import of Renaissance theatre to an analysis of the scripts.... Ideology is enacted through all the theatre's practices, from its pricing structures for admission to the times of its performances.' The impact of theatrical production extends far beyond the academy and the attention of this thesis to specific theatrical versions of the plays, is symptomatic of its acknowledgement that a theatre audience is likely to be both larger and more heterogeneous than the readership of a single academic study.

Although recent criticism has examined the Renaissance theatre in terms of its materiality and although there is much important work here, there is still a reluctance to consider the political efficacy of modern Shakespearean production. Although Political Shakespeare itself contains an essay on the Royal Shakespeare Company and another on the theatre of Brecht and his rewritings of Shakespeare, there is an unwillingness to consider individual productions and the manner in which they may serve to illustrate or articulate particular

---

social shakespeare: i

political issues. Conversely there is an ever-increasing amount of new publications describing and analysing specific performances, but these studies tend too readily to separate the texts (with their 'themes' and dramatic techniques) and the particular performances that they are considering. Most often, the written text takes priority over the performative one. The recent monographs in the 'text and performance' series illustrate the apparent disparity of the titular components with strictly separate sections for each; text of course comes first. Keir Elam, however, has pointed out that 'the written text ... is determined by its very need for stage contextualization, and indicates throughout its allegiance to the physical conditions of performance.... the written text/performance text relationship is not one of simple priority but a complex of reciprocal constraints constituting a powerful intertextuality.' In line with Elam's assertion, 'social shakespeare' considers theatre as a system of conventions which are always available for ideological motivation. Moreover, 'social shakespeare' consistently attempts to integrate its understandings of the plays with evidence from particular productions. Of course, this involves the selection of productions which (usually) reinforce the thesis, but this is not to say that a particular interpretation is in any sense more valid than a contradictory one. Theatrical interpretation is notoriously 'open', and the appropriation of individual theatrical readings to support textual ones needs always to acknowledge its own relativity. Jean E. Howard neatly sums up this idea, 'one cannot assume that theatrical representations have an ideological significance that is fixed and unchanging, or that is unaffected by the conditions in which the representations are produced and consumed.' 27 Despite the potency of Howard's formulation and its applicability to Shakespeare ancient and modern, she confines herself to the Renaissance stage. 'Social Shakespeare' regards this as a limitation.

25 the theatre is in an unrivalled position to respond to current affairs. In August 1992, David thacker's production of the merry wives of windsor illustrated this kind of topicality. As Falstaff seduced Mistress Ford, he tore off her shoe and put her toe in his mouth. The allusions to the david mellor affair and similar accusations involving the duchess of York made the moment especially redolent! As John Peter slyly wrote, 'nice to see someone at windsor enjoying themselves.' (the sunday times, 6 september 1992.) Further accusations of sexual misconduct levelled against the minister for fun included the charge that he 'recited shakespeare in the nude'. (the guardian, 23 september 1992.) No wonder that the Tories want the bard to be a compulsory part of the national curriculum!

Because literary criticism is primarily a written form, it is not surprising that it takes as its traditional object, even in the case of drama, printed versions of text. Of course, we should remind ourselves of the anachronism of working on printed editions of plays which, in the playwright's own day, had no sort of textual authority whatever. Thomas Healy alerts us to the spurious fixity of the playtexts upon which traditional literary criticism is based:

There has been much important work in the past decade demystifying the editorial practice of scholarship, revealing the ideological or other cultural desires editors assume. Surprisingly, though, there have been few attempts to acknowledge the fluidity of Renaissance plays. Critical discussions may emphasise the drama's popularity within English Renaissance society and examine the conditions of theatrical playing within Elizabethan and Jacobean society, but considerations of plays rarely acknowledge that many possess multiple forms. 28

I would suggest that this multiplicity of forms does not merely refer to the sometimes extremely divergent textual versions of plays, but also to the infinite variety of their stage manifestations. These are augmented every time the play is performed, whether it be in the sixteenth or twentieth century.

This abundance of textual and performative manifestations is partially responsible for one of the most striking features of recent Shakespearean criticism - its frequent contrariety. This lack of a single authority is in part at least the result of the uncertainty that is criticism's post-structuralist inheritance, in which Shakespeare studies inevitably shares. Its most obvious symptom is the abundance of anthologies which seem to have outstripped publication of scholarly monographs. The publication of Political Shakespeare took place in the same year as Alternative Shakespeares and Shakespeare and the Question of Theory. These ground-breaking collections have since been followed by a number of revisionist anthologies including within the last six years: Literary Theory/Renaissance Texts, The Shakespeare Myth, Shakespeare Reproduced, Rewriting the Renaissance, The Appropriation of Shakespeare, Staging the Renaissance, The Matter of Difference, Shakespeare Left and Right, and most recently, three anthologies in the Longman Critical Readers series: Shakespeare's Comedies, Shakespearean Tragedy, and New Historicism and Renaissance Drama. Even individual authors are producing collections of essays, comprising the bringing together of articles that have been published in their own right previously in journals and other collections rather than sustained and coherent studies, most obviously Shakespearean Negotiations and Learning to Curse by Stephen Greenblatt or the more traditional Young Hamlet: Essays on Shakespeare's Tragedies by Barbara Everett. The abundance of anthologies is no doubt a symptom of the institutional pressure upon academics to publish as well as an indication of market forces in relation to the kinds of reading matter which can be digested by undergraduates (who often perform better with two or three anthologies than many scholarly monographs - witness also the number of 'readers' in critical theory which have been published in the last five years). In Renaissance studies this plethora of anthologies is indicative of the plurality of contemporary intellectual positions in relation to the culture of the early modern period and is especially the result of the ambiguities and lack of single ontology inherent in the theatrical experience. The moral and ideological complexities of the plays themselves along with the bewildering multivalency of the theatrical representation have necessitated the abandonment of a single unifying viewpoint. The same play can be constructive of both conservative and radical positions and, moreover, it may be both at the same time. The recent emphasis in Renaissance studies on contradiction rather than cohesion, subversion rather than order, and difference rather than uniformity, is of a piece with the relativisation of both the critical judgements and their object of study. Critics now tend to emphasise polyphony and perplexity; Tillyardian uniformity is long gone and we fashion the Renaissance in our own fragmented image. In her 'Afterword' to Shakespeare Reproduced (which for obvious reasons could not be called a conclusion), Margaret Ferguson offers a prime example of this kind of rejection of a holistic scheme (or meta-narrative): 'One of the results of working on this volume ... is that I see more clearly now than I did a year ago the contours of what I don't know, or cannot articulate clearly'.  32 Christopher Hampton attributes this critical puzzlement to the social circumstances of the plays' composition. Of Shakespeare's images he writes, 'they are founded on the incompleteness and impurity of material reality, as determined by the changing laws of causality and of history, in terms of which the subjective energies of human beings are seen to be caught up on the 32 Margaret Ferguson, 'Afterword' to Shakespeare Reproduced, 273 - 283, p. 273.

---

cross-currents of action and reaction, the struggle to make sense of their lives." The confusion is not only in the eye of the beholder, but in the object itself.

It is in his seminal essay, 'The Circulation of Social Energy' that Greenblatt is most forthright in his call to abandon any single or fixed critical perspective, seeing the Renaissance stage as well as its critical investigation as deeply contradictory:

the circulation of social energy by and through the stage was not part of a single coherent, totalizing system. Rather it was partial, fragmentary, conflictual; elements were crossed, torn apart, recombined, set against each other; particular social practices were magnified by the stage, others diminished, exalted, evacuated. What then is the social energy that is being circulated? Power, charisma, sexual excitement, collective dreams, wonder, desire, anxiety, religious awe, free-floating intensities of experience: in a sense the question is absurd, for everything produced by the society can circulate unless it is deliberately excluded from circulation. Under such circumstances, there can be no single method, no overall picture, no exhaustive and definitive cultural poetics.

The inherent creative collaboration of drama (and the performance contingent upon it) which is above all other literary forms socially produced, makes the rejection of a single author/authority especially appropriate. 'Social Shakespeare' shares this heterogeneity. The choice of plays for detailed study, for example, includes the canonical (Antony and Cleopatra) and the marginal (Two Gentlemen of Verona). This project is aware of its own partiality in both senses of being fragmentary, and ordered by its own critical preferences. This partiality is signified by the self-conscious 'inventoriness' of the subtitle, 'Aspects of ...'.

---

34 Greenblatt, Shakespearean Negotiations, p. 19.
35 For the collaborative nature of dramatic production, see chapter IX.
Greenblatt's rejection of a critical purchase may appear to be (especially in the light of my remarks about the political indifference of the new historicism above) morally irresponsible. 'Social Shakespeare', while it accepts Greenblatt's relativism, prefers, not to decode it in terms of a political paralysis or metaphysical chaos which would itself be politically impotent, but rather to see the fragmentation and contradictions of both the plays and their analyses as subversive of an apparently transparent version of Shakespeare which sees him as the purveyor of eternal human value. Such an unproblematised and essentialist version is inevitably authoritative and prescriptive. 'Social Shakespeare' intends to highlight the identity of the power of culture and the culture of power which surrounds the performance of plays that are so deeply implicated in versions of truth and value.

II

'Social Shakespeare' is divided into three parts. The first sets out the critical agenda and methodology and situates the study in relation to more traditional criticism. Chapter II discusses the difficulty of defining Shakespearean comedy and so challenges glib ideas about happiness and festivity. It asserts instead that the plays are both narratively and generically unstable and that in the teeth of this instability they demand a consensual response that guarantees their audience a solidarity which they foreground in their titles. Chapter III again focuses on formal and generic qualities, this time those of tragedy. It challenges a critical practice which although it sounds outmoded, is still being taught to students at 'A' and undergraduate level. The idea of the 'fatal flaw' of the tragic hero is deconstructed and demonstrated to be essentialist and aistorical in its assumptions and reactionary and deterministic in its politics. Chapter III goes on to consider the centrality of the acting body and its radical and obvious inconsistency with the abstract 'tragic flaw'. The fourth chapter addresses the issue of gendered geography in the literature and visual arts of the Renaissance and focuses on the manner in which Shakespeare's exploration of the idea is subversive of the norm. The chapter concludes that the collapse of gendered imagery, principally illustrated in Antony and Cleopatra, is a dramatic strategy which, as well as being responsible for the play's reputation as one of Shakespeare's most ambiguous works, is itself symptomatic of the epistemological uncertainty which characterises the early modern period.

Part Two: Dramaturgy and Language, is an attempt to read specific plays with reference to particular Shakespearean techniques and in the light of the procedural explications of Part One. Chapter V explores the notion of drama occurring at the boundaries of the conscious and unconscious mind. But it extends this idea to a consideration of the manner in which private fantasy (particularly that surrounding issues of sexual initiation) is appropriated and anticipated by certain social forces. Ideas set up in chapter II, associated with social consensus are again seen to be at work. The sixth chapter is a demonstration that formal and 'political' criticism are not necessarily different things. It considers how a particular kind of speaking is politically subversive and how the social world needs to censor ambiguous speech in order to reinforce its authority. As Kiernan Ryan puts it:

> What is exposed by the plays' exuberantly gratuitous flights of verbal fancy and manic-digressive equivocation is the fluid, unfixable nature of language itself, and hence the instability of the structures of meaning which encode and protract the reigning structures of contemporary life. 36

---

Linguistic analysis is shown to be inseparable from social analysis, the world of language indistinct from the language of the world. A 'merely' formal criticism, which is so often eschewed by Shakespeare's oppositional critics, is thus shown to have a real political force.

The final Part, Society and Culture, is the most obviously politicised. Chapter VII considers The Merchant of Venice and The Jew of Malta alongside Walter Benjamin's remarks about the barbarism that underlies all cultural achievement. It considers specific controversies that the plays raise in the post-Holocaust period and questions the bland assumption of their inherent greatness. A number of recent productions of the plays are discussed in an effort to illustrate the racism or otherwise not just of the texts but of the theatrical establishment that reproduces them. The chapter argues that an awareness of the social conditions of Jews in early modern England will ensure that anti-Semitism (at least in respect of these particular texts) is seen to be historically specific.

No other subject area in Shakespeare studies has generated quite as much vociferous interest as sexuality. Chapter VIII considers the importance of all-male companies in the Renaissance theatre and the implications this may have both for feminist readings of the texts and today's mixed-sex theatre industry. As with chapter VII, particular historically specific social ideas are cited and analysed in an attempt to consider the cultural implications of the various shifts between Renaissance playing and modern theatrical representations. The final chapter concludes by discussing versions of the Bard as he is mythologised by some and deconstructed by others. Shakespeare's apotheosis as a cultural 'deity' has been ratified principally by two agencies, education and the commercial theatre, and this chapter demonstrates their symbiosis in the construction of Shakespeare as a mythological Everyman. The chapter theorises what it calls
'Shakemyth': the complex of cultural ideas surrounding the plays, the social institutions through which they are reproduced and the re-presentation of the mythologised persona of the playwright. Although this might seem an obvious approach in the light of recent work on the cultural construction of Shakespeare by Terence Hawkes, Alan Sinfield, Gary Taylor and others, evidence from the theatre and the National Curriculum illustrates that this is far from a popular or fashionable approach. Shakemyth is always a-historical and asocial and thus exempt from re-reading. 'Social Shakespeare' contributes to the exposure of Shakemyth as a dangerous essentialising strategy which amiably protests its own political neutrality while at the same time exercising a deeply reactionary political influence.

The publication of Political Shakespeare signalled the arrival of political criticism in Shakespeare studies. 'Social Shakespeare' hopes to refine and promote this practice while embarking on a still broader project - the study of Shakespearean drama in its fully social context.
Part One: Genre and Imagery
Shakespeare's Comedy of Consensus

For poetry makes nothing happen. ¹

On 14 February 1989 Salman Rushdie was sentenced to death. ² On 2 November 1992 the Iranian Khordad 15 Foundation raised the bounty on his head. ³ The last four years of murders, death threats, intimidation and massive political disturbance surrounding the publication and reception of The Satanic Verses, serve as a perfect illustration of just how wrong Auden is. In one sense though, paradoxically, Auden is correct: poetry (or literature) does make nothing happen; in other words nothing is brought about by literature. Literature can and does question the apparently commonsensical notions which have ceased to be important to us, unquestioned orthodoxies which have hardened into unnoticeable realities, into, so to speak, nothings. Literature, then, makes these nothings happen. We are examining Islam, Iranian politics, the issues of censorship and racism afresh in the light of a novel. Literature can bring about social and political change, or more likely in the case of Rushdie's book, serve as a channel to direct the flow

² The fatwa was recently endorsed approvingly by Dr Kalim Saddiqui - chair of the British Parliament of Muslims - in an interview (Beyond Belief) with Ludovic Kennedy broadcast on Radio Four on 5 September 1992.
³ 'The organisation will provide the necessary, including financial, support to all those who may come to any loss or harm in their support of the Imam's [Ayatollah Khomeini's] fatwa.' (The Guardian, 3 November 1992.)
of religious or political feelings which will effect change for good or ill. What we are doing when we meet in any classroom, is discussing texts that really have the power to change people's lives. Those who think this assertion grandiose need only ask themselves why Rushdie's book has been burned, and its author sentenced to death; the answer must be because the work is important enough to somebody.

Could a discussion of Shakespearean comedy be anywhere near as contentious? We are all supposed to know what Shakespearean comedy is. We have read (or more likely seen) at least one example, and we certainly all recognise that As You Like It is a comedy while King Lear is something else. Unfortunately though, a familiarity with the plays and even an intuitive grasp of the kind of drama constituted by Shakespearean comedy does not enable us to define the genre. In other words, the fact that we share a consensus about the sort of thing that Shakespearean comedy is, does little to change the fact that Shakespearean comedy, in itself, is nothing (in particular). The ironies of setting and marking examination questions on Shakespearean comedy are thus brought sharply into focus. While such questions ask students to negotiate the terrain of Shakespearean comedy, no-one can really tell them precisely where to go. Teachers and lecturers can point students in the right direction but there are no accurate maps, no single objective and correct account of the subject. One need only look in any academic library at the sheer range of works, at the colossal energies which have attempted to locate the evasions of Shakespearean comedy. The University of Leicester library, for example, boasts some 250 items under this specific heading. Even the OED fails to capture the infinite variety of Shakespearean comedy. It offers, 'A light and amusing stage play with a happy conclusion to its plot.' But are Malvolio's final 'I'll be reveng'd on the whole pack of you' (V. i. 364), or a tired old fool singing about the rain and the impotence of old age, the signs of a happy conclusion? The OED continues: 'That branch of the drama which ... depicts laughable characters and incidents.' But try telling that to the wedding guests in Much Ado after the 'death' of the bride, or explaining to Phoebe that the man she so desperately wants to marry (at the end of As You Like It) and who has theoretically promised himself to her is actually a woman. Shakespearean comedy accommodates the unjust incarceration and taunting of Malvolio, the vicious and humiliating slander of Hero at her own wedding, the marginalisation and ultimate rejection of Jaques, Feste, and Antonio (the sea captain). Shakespearean comedy can even encompass, in the demise of the withered old Adam, death; not counterfeit death, like Hero's or Hermione's, nor even death which is threatened but unrealised (as with the snake about to entwine itself around the neck of Oliver), but the final complete disappearance which looks back to the first capital offence - eating a piece of forbidden fruit. This Adam, like his namesake, and ultimately like all of us, must return to ashes; hardly a cheery thought for a comic play! 'Dear master, I can go no further. O, I die for food! Here lie I down, and measure out my grave. Farewell kind master' (II. vi. 1 - 3). Adam, depending on the director's choice, may be seen or not after this moment. That Shakespeare gave him no further lines suggests that his death, after the camp-fire scene, is a dramatic possibility.

When Dr Johnson published his edition of Shakespeare's works in 1765, he rightly recognised the tensions within single plays between the comic and the uncomic:

> Shakespeare's plays are not in the rigorous and critical sense either tragedies or comedies, but compositions of a distinct kind.... Shakespeare has united the powers of exciting laughter and sorrow not only in one mind but in one composition. Almost all his plays are divided between serious and ludicrous characters, and, in the successive evolutions of the design, sometimes produce seriousness and sorrow, and sometimes levity and laughter.

---

We only have to think of the co-existence in a single play of characters as diverse as Don John and Dogberry, or Touchstone and Jaques to see what Johnson means. The question remains though, how are we as literary critics to cope with this diversity?

II

As the players approach the court of Elsinor, Polonius introduces them to their patron Hamlet in terms of a banal catalogue of different literary genres as:

The best actors in the world, either for tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, tragical-historical, tragical-comical-historical-pastoral, scene individable, or poem unlimited.

(II. ii. 392 - 394)

It is tempting to see our desire to objectify, to define the characteristics, to delimit fully Shakespearean comedy, as this kind of pedantic scholasticism. Even Polonius has to form compounds to describe usefully the ambivalence of the players' work. His own critical discourse stretches itself impossibly around the multivalent possibilities of the acting. In so doing, he is preempting every one of the literary commentators who, in the last four-hundred years, has attempted to define Shakespearean comedy. But unlike a good many of them, he realises, albeit uncomfortably, that the subject calls into question the actual processes, even the very language through which he articulates it. Shakespearean comedy seems to be trying to resist descriptive accounts of itself, shirking the bridle of critical control, and this unwillingness to serve makes it what it is. We apprehend the nature of the beast in terms of its resistance. Shakespearean comedy throws its rider by taking us along with it into its own world of uncertainty and bewilderment, a world where Bottom is transformed into an animal and couples with a fairy queen, a world where boy actors dress as girls and then become boys to woo other boys that they want for their female selves, a world where sad and merry madness coexist, servants become masters and masters slaves. It is a labyrinthine world with no fixed sign-posts; a world where the dense thickets of the forest conspire to exclude the cold light of reason, a place that abounds in the mystery of language itself with statements like Feste's 'Nothing that is so is so' (IV. i. 8), or Viola's 'I am not what I am' (III. i. 138). Sebastian, finding himself propositioned by a rich and beautiful woman whom he has never met before, rationalises his good fortune by looking for a certainty beyond the craziness of Illyria:
Social Shakespeare: II

This is the air; that is the glorious sun;
This pearl she gave me, I do feel't, and see't;
And though 'tis wonder that enwraps me thus,
Yet 'tis not madness.

(IV. iii. 1 - 4)

If the cold light of day shines here, the darkness of Malvolio's prison cell, acts as a focus both for the deprivation of light (standing for reason), and accordingly the opacity of language:

Fest: Say'st thou that house is dark?
Malv: As hell, Sir Topas.
Fest: Why, it hath bay windows as transparant as barricadoes, and the clerestories toward the south north are as lustrous as ebony; and yet complainest thou of obstruction?

(IV. ii. 34 - 39)

5 On the function of the boy actor and the homoerotic, see chapter VIII.
6 On the subject of linguistic ambiguity in Shakespeare's plays, see chapter VI.
If the sign posts of Illyria can point only south-north, how are we to find our way in the world, in the world of Shakespearean comedy in particular and in the world of literary criticism generally?

Raymond Williams recounts his early bewilderment at the inconclusiveness of Shakespeare studies. In the autumn of 1939, he found himself as a student in the North Wing of Cambridge University Library:

I was there to pick up a couple of books on Shakespeare for an essay. My first impression of those hundreds of volumes, tightly stacked in what looked like an industrial warehouse, can be best understood if I add that this was the first time I had been in any library larger than a living room. Wandering in and out, trying to decipher (as still today) the complicated system of classification, I came across a section which induced a kind of vertigo. I don’t, fortunately, remember all the actual titles, but a quick scan showed me Shakespeare as royalist, democrat, catholic, puritan, feudalist, progressive, humanist, racist, Englishman, homosexual, Marlowe, Bacon and so on around the bay. I flicked the pages of some of the more improbable ascriptions. The compounded smell of disuse and of evidence rose to my nostrils. I got out and went for a walk. 7

The similarity between Williams’s and Polonius’s taxonomic struggles points up the fact that Shakespeare’s comedy, just like that of Hamlet’s players, lies beyond an easy classification. The traditional idea of literary criticism as one which answers questions about the play, which seeks to lay bare certain embedded truths within it, which, in the words of Tony Bennett, ‘sets out to deliver the text from its own silences by coaxing it into giving up its true, latent or hidden meaning’ - this idea of literary criticism is one which cannot cope with Shakespeare’s comic plays. 8

So, where do we go from here? If classification is beyond us and all our readings are unique and different, how can we begin to discuss Much Ado or Twelfth Night at all? I said earlier that although none of us could come up with a dictionary definition of comedy - indeed we saw that even the dictionary couldn't manage that - that we all have a more or less rough idea of what Shakespearean comedy is like. How can this be? I believe that the answer lies partly in the plays' titles. What the plays seem to be about and the ways in which we understand them are in fact identical (- an assertion I want to return to later). The watchword is consensus. The plays are insistent that we must share values with them, that we can only make sense of their chaotic world if we recognise that we are implicated in a conspiratorial relationship with them. Titles like Measure for Measure, Much Ado About Nothing and All's Well That Ends Well assure us that these plays unfold in a comic universe, that we can rely upon a sense of balance (measure for measure) or providence to sort things out. Angelo's vicious manipulation of Isabella, Hero's death, Helena's separation from her husband are urgent and threatening, but at the same time we know that they are problems that have been raised only to be solved.

Shakespeare's comic world is a dream world where our deepest desires are realised. Mercutio, in Romeo and Juliet, recognises the propensity for different people to have different priorities: lovers dream of love, lawyers of fees, and soldiers of cutting throats. It is no accident that at its most anarchic moment, Shakespeare's most indulgent comedy A Midsummer Night's Dream, draws attention to its own harmlessness and, at the same time to the importance of fantasy or dreaming. Puck assures us:

```
the country proverb [shall be] known,
That every man should take his own,
In your waking shall be shown.
```

---

9 On Shakespearean drama and dream, see chapter V.
Social Shakespeare: II

Jack shall have Jill;
Nought shall go ill;
The man shall have his mare again, and all shall be well.

(III. ii. 458 - 463)

Viola in Twelfth Night is prepared to trust the comic spirit too: 'O Time, thou must untangle this, not I; / It is too hard a knot for me t' untie!' (II. ii. 38 - 39). These plays are comedies, precisely because their knots are eventually untied and our enjoyment is in watching how the solutions will come about rather than wondering if they are going to happen at all.

Other play titles are even more eager to make explicit the contract that they share with the audience: The Comedy of Errors, Twelfth Night or What You Will, and perhaps most obviously As You Like It. These plays either announce their own comic status for us and thereby indicate that nothing can go wrong, or simply project their openness onto us. These plays mean whatever we want them to mean, they are in that sense vehicles for our own wish fulfilment. But if our enjoyment of the plays depends upon their willingness to rely upon our judgements, to surrender to their autonomy, they also implicitly demand that we share their moral strategies, that the consensus which allows us to decode them and approve of them, is actually set up by them and moreover is, as we shall see, even constructed deliberately to exclude certain social groups. Linda E. Boose contextualises this 'comic contract' against the social circumstances of Renaissance dramatic practice attributing it to 'the new commercial enterprise of public theatre.' ¹⁰ She writes, 'With its emphasis on social bonds, comedy inherently proposes a structure that is peculiarly dependent on audience gratification.' ¹¹

¹¹ Ibid., p. 241.
Shakespearean comedy works by exclusion. Different levels of knowledge are exposed in front of an audience that is privy to all the secrets. We know that the letter that Malvolio postures with is actually a fraud, we know that Sir Topas is really Feste, we know that Ganymede is really Rosalind, that Cesario is really Viola, that Hero’s death is an elaborate hoax, that Benedick and Beatrice are playing 'hard to get', and that Aguecheek is being ruthless exploited by Toby. We are consistently shown the shortfall in the various readings of the world that abound in places like Messina, Arden and Illyria. Ours is the position of looker on, just like the three crouched behind the box-tree, aware of the disparity in the relative amounts of knowledge that the characters possess regarding their place in the world and their relationships to others. No-one in the plays knows as much as we do - even Feste mistakes Sebastian for Viola. We are omniscient precisely because the plays' characters are not. Excluded from the social know-how and ultimately from self-knowledge, Shakespeare's comic figures struggle laughably to make sense of fragments of evidence. We cannot shout 'Look behind you' to Malvolio, although Toby nearly does: 'Ay, and you had any eye behind you, you might see more detraction at your heels than fortunes before you' (II. v. 124). We cannot tell Orlando or Orsino who these young lads actually are, because the essential ingredient of Shakespeare's comic construction is our recognition that we are in a more complete condition of knowledge, and this is, as I have suggested, the prerequisite of the plays' titles.

The phrase 'what you will' appears five times in Shakespearean drama. In As You Like It, Jaques asks Amiens to sing another stanza. 'Jaques: Call you 'em stanzos? Amiens: What you will, Monsieur Jaques' (II. v. 17 - 18). In Twelfth Night Olivia instructs Malvolio to get rid of the young man calling at her door: 'if it be a suit from the Count, I am sick, or not at home - what you will to dismiss it' (I. v. 102). The other three instances (Two Gentlemen, A Midsummer Night's Dream, Othello accord with this use of the phrase - what amounts really to a delegation of responsibility. You can call the verses of my song whatever you want to call them, says Amiens, while Olivia gives Malvolio free reign to decide on the excuse to repulse the suitor at her door. When the phrase is used as a subtitle to one of Shakespeare's plays (Twelfth Night), it has the same effect. Ours is the responsibility, ours the judgement that will liberate or indict the characters and ultimately the play itself. Feste tells us that the players will strive to please us every day, but ultimately they can do no more than strive.

What is at stake, then, in these kinds of titles is an appeal for audience participation. We are asked to ally ourselves with the structures of comic values in place and to embrace them. As Olivia tells us, it is a system of values to which Malvolio refuses to subscribe:

> O, you are sick of self-love, Malvolio, and taste with a distemper'd appetite. To be generous, guiltless, and of free disposition, is to take those things for bird-bolts that you deem cannon-bullets.
>
>(I. v. 85 - 87)

Along with Malvolio, it is we who are being asked not to make mountains out of molehills, not to take this Shakespearean illusion too seriously. Puck offers a solution to those in the audience who have been upset by A Midsummer Night's Dream:

> If we shadows have offended,
> Think but this, and all is mended,
> That you have but slumb'red here
> While these visions did appear.

---

12 For a slightly more trenchant reading of these titles, see Richard Dutton who believes that they challenge as much as embrace their audience: 'the titles of his later romantic comedies ... followed a vogue in the late 1590s for off-handed flippancy.... All's Well that Ends Well ... is balanced on a provocative edge between complacency and cynicism.' (William Shakespeare: A Life (London 1989), p. 95.)
Social Shakespeare: II

And this weak and idle theme,
No more yielding but a dream,
Gentles, do not reprehend.
If you pardon, we will mend.

(V. i. 412 - 419)

By pretending the play is no more than a dream, we can in effect make it part of our own mental process, we can forgive it. 13

The comedies attempt, then, to assert the existence of what we might usefully think of as an ideal interpretative community, not merely in terms of the way in which their own social fabrics are reordered after a period of anarchy (Senior returns to his dukedom, Hero and Claudio are reconciled, Orsino and Olivia are successfully united - though of course, only as in-laws) - not simply in terms of the formulation of a stable and secure society in the plays, but also in their usually successful attempts to elicit the audience's corroboration. We do agree to befriend Puck, we do wish Rosalind a kind farewell, and even the bitter-sweet ending of Twelfth Night will generally satisfy. This idea of community, of what I called earlier, consensus, is latent in the titles of the plays. Our approval is sought before the plays even begin. 14 The final harmonious ending of comedy brought about by audience assent has long been recognised as the feature which distinguishes the genre from tragedy. We find the assumption voiced in Shakespeare's own time in the platitude of Thomas Heywood, 'Comedies begin in trouble, and end in peace; Tragedies begin in calmes, and end in tempest.' 15

---

13 For further discussion of this speech, see chapter V.
14 For discussion of the titles of Shakespeare's tragic plays, see chapter VII.
15 Thomas Heywood, An Apology for Actors. Containing three brief Treatises. 1 Their Antiquity 2 Their ancient Dignity 3 The true use of their quality (London, 1612), F 1v.
I have not tried to offer a solution to the problem of defining Shakespearean comedy, but rather to account for the broad differences in interpretative strategies between comedy and other sorts of play. I have tried to illustrate that the comedies require the vindication of their audience not merely in terms of their epilogues but also, more obviously, in terms of their titles. I said earlier that, what the plays seem to be about and the ways in which we understand them are in fact identical. Having attempted to show that we understand them in terms of a consensus that we share with them, I now want to consider how the plays actually deal with the notion of consensus.

In his history of youth subcultures, the sociologist Dick Hebdige analyses teds, mods, rockers, skinheads, and punks in terms of their rejection of a single cultural identity: 'the emergence of such groups', he writes 'has signalled in spectacular fashion the breakdown of consensus in the post-war period.' 16 In other words, the multitude of youth styles indicates a profound dissatisfaction with the prevailing social consensus. Fashion (or in the case of punk, anti-fashion - which is itself of course a fashion) is a means of signifying an attitude, a kind of consensus to a larger social group (other punks). Fashion is a signal both of dissatisfaction and non-conformity and paradoxically of satisfaction and conformity.

The Messina of Much Ado is an inescapably fashion-conscious place. We hear about rabatos and slops (ruffs and baggy breeches), about gloves, doublets, masks, and even Dogberry insists that he owns two gowns. Pedro and Claudio debate going to the barbers to have beards trimmed, and Beatrice tells the messenger of Benedick's inconstancy in terms of his impressionable dress-sense: 'he wears his faith but as the fashion of his hat; it ever changes with the next block' (I. i. 65). Margaret and Hero discuss at length 'the Duchess of Milan's gown that they praise so' (III. iv. 15) and the maid tactfully attempts to persuade the bride that 'yours is worth ten on't' (l. 21). In III. iii Conrade and Borachio discuss the importance of looking like the times:

---

Bora: Thou knowest that the fashion of a doublet, or a hat, or a cloak, is nothing to a man.

Conr: Yes, it is apparel.

Bora: I mean, the fashion.

Conr: The fashion is the fashion....

Bora: Seest thou not, I say, what a deformed thief this fashion is, how giddily 'a turns about all the hot bloods between fourteen and five and thirty, sometimes fashioning them like Pharaoh's soldiers in the reechy painting, sometime like god Bel's priests in the old church-window, sometime like the shaven Hercules in the smirch'd worm-eaten tapestry, where his codpiece seems as massy as his club?

Conr: All this I see; and I see that the fashion wears out more apparel than a man. But art not thou thyself giddy with the fashion too, that thou hast shifted out of thy tale into telling me of the fashion?

(III. iii. 108 -131)

In Messina, it is even fashionable to talk about the fashion and Conrade's contempt for it and his allegation that Borachio has become side-tracked by this irrelevant topic (note his pun on shift meaning 'a shirt') indicate that he does not belong in this Voguish world. The word 'fashion' appears eighteen times in this play, more than in any other of Shakespeare's works. 17 Fashion is significant because we are able to measure by their attitude towards it, the relative loyalties of individuals to the dominant social consensus.

17 Since drafting this chapter, Pamela Mason's recent book on the play has come to my attention. She seems to be in accord with this idea about the importance of fashion to the play: 'Wherever Messina is found, it is defined by its codes of conduct and patterns of behaviour. Its concern with fashion is central not peripheral. Throughout the play, the text prompts us to think in fashionable terms ... conceptually the references to fashion reinforce the importance of that which is judged and endorsed through appearances.' (Much Ado About Nothing: Text and Performance (London, 1992), p. 12.)
It is no accident that the play's thugs are so unfashionable. Even Benedick realises that Claudio's new obsession with fashion indicates a recently formed social relationship. I have known when he would have walk'd ten mile afoot to see a good armour, and now will he lie ten nights awake carving the fashion of a new doublet' (II. iii. 17). When Ursula and Hero are accidentally-on-purpose overheard in an effort to matchmake the two Bs, they dwell on Beatrice's dissent from fashionable behaviour:

\[
\begin{align*}
Ursu: & \quad \text{Sure, sure, such carping is not commendable.} \\
Hero: & \quad \text{No; not to be so odd and from all fashions,} \\
& \quad \text{As Beatrice is, cannot be commendable;} \\ & \quad \text{But who dare tell her so?}
\end{align*}
\]

(III. i. 71 - 74)

Fashion corresponds, as Hebdige implies, directly to social unanimity, mutual sympathy, and likemindedness, in short to consensus. In Twelfth Night, Toby tells Maria that 'I'll confine myself no finer than I am' (I. iii. 9), in other words, he will dress according to his station. 'These clothes be good enough to drink in, and so be these boots too', he continues. Aguecheek is concerned about his hairstyle ('But it becomes me well enough, doesn't not?' (I. iii. 95)), while Viola recognises the impropriety of hugging her brother in her 'masculine usurp'd attire' (V. i. 242). Feste points out that his fool's loud check conceals a sharp-witted and adroit sense of humour: 'I wear not motley in my brain' (I. v. 52).

The assertion that the obsession with fashion marks a superficiality in social relationships echoes the often vituperative writings of the early modern period on the question of dress. As Lisa Jardine has shown, sumptuary law was an important consideration in a society determined to discourage social mobility. Contemporary sources insist upon the propriety of dressing according to rank and scorn is reserved for those who confine themselves finer than they are. Ideas of social and class 'consensus' are implicit in sumptuary regulation for confusion of dress leads directly to the erosion of the social order:

as for the priuat subiects, it is not at any hand lawful that they should wear silks, veluets, satens, damasks, gould, siluer and what they list (though they be neuer so able to maintain it) except they being in some kinde of office in the common wealth, do vse it for the dignifying and innobling of the same. But now there is such a confuse mingle mangle of apparel in Aigna, and such preposterous excess thereof as everyone is permitted to flaunt it out, in what apparell he lust himselfe, or can get by any meanes. So that it is verie hard to knowe, who is noble, who is worshipfull, who is a gentleman, who is not: for you shall have those, which are neither of the nobilitie, nor yeomanry, no, nor yet anie Magistrat or Officer in the common welth, go daylie in silkes, veluets, satens, damasks, taffeties, and such like, not withstanding that they be both base by byrthe, meane by estate, & seruyle by calling. This is a great confusion & a general disorder, God be mercyfull vnto vs. 19

Despite Stubbes's misgivings, Thomas Lodge was convinced that Elizabeth was not taken in by appearances: 'think you that the gracious Elizabeth cannot ... finde out a vain head vnder a wauing feather, a dissolute minde vnder a codpeece dublet, a wanton thought vnder a straunge habite.... the eye fixed on heauenlye contemplations, gazeth not on earthlye beautie.' 20 For John Harington, dressing beyond one's station was part of a larger vice of human affectation:

---

19 Phillip Stubbes, The Anatomie of Abuses (London,1583), C ii².
20 Thomas Lodge, An Alarvm against Vsurers. Containing tryed experiences against worldly abuses (London, 1584), F ii².
are; we barbe and shave ofte, so seeme yownger than wee are; we use perfumes both inward and outward to seeme sweeter then wee bee; cokrt shooes to seeme taller then wee bee; wee use cowtruows salutations to seem kinder then wee bee; lowly obaysances to seem humbler then wee bee; and sometyme grave and godly communication to seem wyser or devower then wee bee. 21

Thomas More likewise considered dressing up to be mere mannerism: 'In this counterfeit kind of pleasure they put them ... the better gownes they have on, the better men they think themselves. In which thing they do twice err, for they be no less deceived in that they think their gown the better, than they be in that they think themselves the better.' 22

John Earle sends up the gallant as one who 'is neuer serious but with his Taylor, when hee is in conspiracie for the next deuice.... He is a kind of walking Mercers Shop, and shewes you one Stuffe to day, and another to morrow'. 23 One of the standard objections was financial: 'He is a gull, whose indiscretion, / Cracks his purse strings to be in fashion.' 24 Stubbes is incredulous towards sartorial extravagance: 'now it is small matter to bestowe twentie nobles, ten pound, twentie pound, fortie pound, yea a hundred pound of one paire of Breeches (God be mercifull vnto vs).'</25 Stubbes later refers to the starching houses (in which the ruffs were laundered) as 'brothell houses' and 'farting houses!'. 26 With characteristic temperance, Thomas Heywood attempts to exculpate the sin of over-dressing: 'God hath not enioyed vs to weare all our apparrell solely to defend 24 Everard Guilpin, Skialetheia or A shadowe of Truth, in certaine Epigrams and Satyres (London, 1598), A 6v.

---

Social Shakespeare: II

the cold. Some garments we weare for warmth, others for ornament. So did the children of Israel hang eare-rings in their eares, not was it by the law forbidden them.'

In spite of all the advice to the contrary, clothes for Malvolio, maketh the man. Supposing that his mistress is especially taken with smiling, yellow socks and elaborately crossed garters, he affects the lot in an effort to induce her approval. Maria has of course constructed the list in terms of her lady's pet hates. Smiling will be utterly inappropriate to Olivia's period of mourning, yellow is a colour that she has always loathed and as for cross gartering, it is, we are assured, 'a fashion she detests' (II. v. 181). Malvolio's inability to dress according to the fashions labels him visually as an outsider, not simply a fuddy-diddy. He is not old-fashioned, he is completely out of fashion. His shocking outfit is symbolic of a deeper misalliance with prevailing codes of behaviour and this is best illustrated in his interruption and banning of the comic revels enjoyed by Toby and 'the lighter people' (V. i. 326). Monsieur Melancholy (Jaques in As You Like It) is another example of an unfashionable person. Like Olivia's steward, Jaques remains outside the world of what Michael Jackson calls PYTs (pretty young things), although this is by choice rather than through error. In his famous 'All the world's a stage' speech (II. vii. 139 - 166), Jaques does recognise the importance of fashion to archetypal man. The soldier is 'bearded like a pard', the judge has knowing eyes and 'beard of formal cut', and even senility has its own pathetic fashion: 'lean and slipper'd pantaloon, / With spectacles on nose and pouch on side'. Clothing, in these instances, serves to define the self in accordance with a sartorial norm. Elsewhere, even rituals which suggest the revelation of self in fact symbolise a similar capitulation to larger social conventions.

27 Heywood, An Apology for Actors, C 1v.
Hero herself, Olivia and Rosalind all have the chance in these plays to unveil themselves (the latter metaphorically). Symbolising as it does the revelation of their true selves, the removal of the veil also signifies a preparedness to submit the self to another. (The marriage veil is a fine example of this; indeed Hero's is just such a veil.) This comic consensus, which fashion signifies, has ultimately to do, then, with the formation of social structures from which the unfashionable are banned. There is no place for Jaques, Frederick, Antonio, Aguecheek, Malvolio, Don John, Shylock, (the other) Antonio, etc. Consensus, like fashion, needs to be defined against dissent and disarray. It needs to determine who the outsiders are and rid itself of them. Finally it needs to reassure us that we are not one of them. Fashion then, implies a knowing assent to social and cultural structures and the heroes and heroines of Shakespearean comedies are, for this very reason, natty dressers.

IV

As regards structure, comedy has come a long way since Shakespeare, who in his festive conclusions could pair off any old shit and any old fudge-brained slag (see Claudio and Hero in Much Ado) and get away with it. 28

Shakespearean comedy is almost universally recognised as being comedy about love and marriage. In other words it dramatises a move towards a common structure which binds individual women and men and also admits these new partnerships to the institution of marriage itself. Throughout the course of Shakespeare's comic plays, youngsters (although as the example of Benedick and Beatrice suggests, not exclusively so) are encouraged to move away from their own self-definition to share themselves firstly with another person and secondly, but as a direct consequence, with a universal social structure. Consensus is again in operation. The critical commonplace that the comedies are about youthful rebellion and self-discovery may be true. But such rebellion is only ever temporary. A reversion to social order is the ultimate destination of all of these plays. Orlando, Orsino, Sebastian and Claudio are required in the course of the plays to revalue their own selves and to redefine their personalities in relation to a larger social institution. Moreover, Shakespeare's comedies assure us that it is really the men who are in need of this redefinition. Ganymede and Cesario are witty and smart. Orlando with his sonnets, and Orsino with his self-indulgent and cloying rhetoric illustrate the immaturity of male Narcissism. The men seem to luxuriate in their own frustration, to etherialise the futility of their situation. Against this Rosalind and Viola reject male romantic exaggeration and assert pragmatic and fundamental truths about the nature of relationships: 'men have died from time to time, and worms have eaten them, but not for love' (IV. i. 95).

In Twelfth Night and As You Like It, the sexual roles are never challenged. Although Viola and Rosalind dress up as boys, what the play takes to be their feminine intuitiveness and robust gumption are allowed to shine through their disguises. This is, if not a mother wit, certainly a female one. The situation in Much Ado is somewhat different. Marriage is explicitly conceptualised in terms of an external sociality, in terms of social responsibility rather than individual maturation. The play is set solely in Messina unlike As You Like It which moves away from court to pursue its themes in the forest of Arden, or Twelfth Night which oscillates between Orsino's and Olivia's households. This concentration in terms of setting is related to the increased social stress on the institution of marriage. In Much Ado, love is defined in terms of society, not thought up and worked out in the forest and then taken back to town (as is the case in A...
Midsummer Night's Dream for example). As we might expect, even love for the characters of Much Ado is merely a fashion. Discussing the joining of Benedick and Beatrice, Pedro insists: 'I would fain have it a match, and I doubt not but to fashion it' (II. i. 331). Even the friar's proposition of his plan is tainted by this unfortunate pun:

Let this be so, and doubt not but success
Will fashion the event in better shape
Than I can lay it down in likelihood.

(IV. i. 234 - 236)

Messinian love pretends to be no more than it is, a mechanism for exchanging and sharing political power. When it appears that Hero is dishonest, Pedro makes the political consequences of her transgression clear: 'I stand dishonour'd that have gone about / To link my dear friend to a common stale' (IV. i. 63 - 64). Claudio's initial infatuation with Hero fades with her reputation, as his own political integrity is compromised. Leonato is of course heartbroken, not that his daughter has been publicly defamed, but rather that his own reputation has been sullied. He wishes that he had nurtured a beggar so that if 'smirched thus and mir'd with infamy, / I might have said, "No part of it is mine; / This shame derives itself from unknown loins"' (IV. i. 133 - 135). As has often been remarked upon, Hero is pretty well out of it. Shirley Nelson Garner calls her 'the most silent of Shakespeare's female figures.... Just as she is without speech, so she is without defences.' The marriage of which she is half, does not seem to involve her at all. All important is male reputation, her father's and her husband's. Marriage in Much Ado clearly functions to structure the social fabric rather than to give expression to anything as fanciful as love. Hero's passivity is typical of the mildness of 29 In King Lear the Duke of Burgandy is similarly put off Cordelia for political reasons (I. i. 189 - 246).

the Shakespearen comic heroine when dressed in the clothes of their own sex. For Madelon Sprengnether, this is itself symptomatic of the patriarchal bias of the plays, 'In comedy the absence of the most threatening female 'other', the sexually mature woman ... produces heroines whose power supports the institution of marriage and the maintenance of a stable patriarchal order.' Among men there is no room in Messina for Illyrian fantasy or Arden-like immaturity. Marriage is a hard political reality and reputations, male reputations, are at stake.

Even though As You Like It and Twelfth Night dally with the innocence of love, finally we are assured that marriage is necessary in terms of male benefit. The plays are determined to ensure that marriage has paternal consent and that it will replicate familial structures. The second scene of Twelfth Night assures us that Orsino is a suitable partner for the play's heroine, he is a bachelor and moreover, as if we did not already know having seen him in I. i, he is noble 'in nature as in name' (I. ii. 25). Finally we are told that Viola's father knows him: 'I have heard my father name him' (l. 28). Similarly in As You Like It, Rosalind assures us that her and Orlando's fathers were on the best of terms: 'My father lov'd Sir Rowland as his soul' (I. ii. 214), a sentiment that Senior is allowed to confirm when he greets Orlando to the feast in II. vii: 'If that you were the good Sir Rowland's son ... Be truly welcome hither' (11. 191 - 195). Orlando's mission into the forest in the first place is of course to root out and reassert his father's legacy; wooing Ganymede takes place in the course of this. Family and marriage are, like fashion, indicators of consensus. Until his extraordinary 'conversion' at the play's conclusion, which is of course marked by his marriage to Celia, Oliver has done his best to negate fraternal responsibility, even to the extent of inciting Charles the wrestler to 'break his

---

Madelon Sprengnether, 'The Boy Actor and Femininity in Antony and Cleopatra', in Shakespeare's Personality, 191 - 205, p. 204.
[brother's] neck' (I. i. 130). The plays' outsiders have no time for familial or marital responsibilities. Don John feels towards his brother exactly as Oliver to his: 'I had rather be a canker in a hedge than a rose in his grace' (I. iii. 22) and as for marriage, when he is informed of Claudio's intended match, he responds bluntly: 'Will it serve for any model to build mischief on? What is he for a fool that betroths himself to unquietness?' (I. iii. 41). This impression of marriage in relation to maleness goes a long way to explain the absence of mothers in Shakespeare's drama. Although we hear of Viola's father, and although she introduces herself to her estranged brother via him ('My father had a mole upon his brow...' (V. i. 234)), we never hear of her mother. Hero's mother is briefly alluded to as a potentially unfaithful woman: 'Pedro: I think this is your daughter. Leonato: Her mother hath many times told me so' (I. i. 87 - 88). This sole mention of the mother figure coupled with the possibility of infidelity is replicated in King Lear, and The Tempest. Elsewhere (As You Like It, A Midsummer Night's Dream, The Merchant of Venice, etc.,) mothers are not mentioned at all. Marriage is a male institution wherein women are censored into nothing. The function of marriage at the conclusion of these plays is to render harmless the manipulative skills of Shakespeare's females. Paulina, Isabella, Viola, Rosalind and Beatrice are hurriedly married off to effect their ineffectiveness. These women are required to co-operate with and to submit themselves to a society ruled by men. At the same time as the plays celebrate the resourcefulness of their heroines, they continually point up the fragility of woman. Hero swoons. Innogen sickens, Rosalind passes out at the sight of the bloody handkerchief and Viola tells us quite frankly that she is terrified of the foppish Sir Andrew. The categories of sexual definition remain fundamentally unchallenged; Viola and Rosalind affect an exterior maleness, but this emphasises rather than challenges their interior femaleness. Rosalind, for example, remarks that in spite of her 'swashing ... and martial outside', her heart will contain 'what woman's fear there will' (I. iii. 115).

33 Ann Jemalie Cook notes that following the kiss of Beatrice and Benedick, she is silent for the rest of the play which 'allows Benedick to control the nuptuals.' (Making a Match: Courtship in Shakespeare and his Society (Princeton, 1991), p. 174.)

Ultimately, the movement from solipsism to society, effects a transference of power from the female, where the power lies during courtship to the male where power, both institutionally and socially, lies within marriage. Moreover, while marriage functions to bring men together, it serves to separate the women. Leonato forgives and is reconciled to Claudio and Pedro, Benedick who promised at one time to kill Claudio takes him, through their mutual marriage, as a relative: 'For thy part, Claudio, I did think to have beaten thee; but in that thou art like to be my kinsman, live unbruised, and love my cousin' (V. iv. 108). Marriage separates Desdemona and Emilia, Hermia and Helena, and Rosalind and Celia. One of the most moving descriptions of same-sex attachment in Shakespeare's drama comes in Helena's nostalgia for her and Hermia's childhood days:

We, Hermia, like two artificial gods,
Have with our needles created both one flower,
Both on one sampler, sitting on one cushion,
Both warbling of one song, both in one key;
As if our hands, our sides, voices, and minds,
Had been incorporate. So we grew together,
Like to a double cherry, seeming parted,
But yet an union in partition,
Two lovely berries moulded on one stem;
So, with two seeming bodies, but one heart;
Two of the first, like coats in heraldry,
Due but to one, and crowned with one crest.

(III. ii. 203 - 214, my emphases)

The emphasis on oneness reinforces the physical and emotional intimacy of the girls. This, as Helena goes on to say is ruptured by male interference, 'And will you rent our ancient love asunder / To join with men in scorning your poor friend?' (II. 215 - 216).
Similarly female empathy is destroyed in the course of As You Like It. Celia protests to her father near the beginning of the play that Rosalind is innocent of conspiracy against him:

> If she be a traitor,
> Why so am I: we still have slept together,
> Rose at an instant, leam'd, play'd, eat together;
> And wheresoe'er we went, like Juno's swans,
> Still we went coupled and inseparable.

(I. iii. 68-72)

Even the brutal Charles and the wily Le Beau acknowledge the strength of their bond. The wrestler notes that 'never two ladies loved as they do' (I. i. 103) and the courtier asserts that their 'loves / Are dearer than the natural bond of sisters' (I. ii. 255). Such touching intimacy can never survive the presence of two husbands. As Rosalind tells her father and husband: 'To you I give myself, for I am yours. To you I give myself, for I am yours' (V. iv. 110-111); Celia is nowhere to be seen. Rosalind exists now solely in terms of her relationships with father and husband. Admitted to the patriarchal system, she will never again be liberated. 'As You Like It achieves marital closure not by eliminating male ties but rather by strengthening them.... As You Like It is primarily a defensive action against female power rather than a celebration of it.'

Marriage, functions to reinforce the hegemony of patriarchy, so much so that one recent critic asserted that 'The most vividly realized "marriages" are between men.'

The French feminist Simone De Beauvoir, points out in her book The Second Sex, that if women exist, they do so (in a patriarchal society) only in relation to men. We must, she says, 'face the question: what is a woman?':

---

To state the question is, to me, to suggest, at once, a preliminary answer. The fact that I ask it is in itself significant. A man would never set out to write a book on the peculiar situation of the human male. But if I wish to define myself, I must first of all say: 'I am a woman'; on this truth must be based all further discussion. A man never begins by presenting himself as an individual of a certain sex; it goes without saying that he is a man. 36

I have shown how the idea of consensus, operating via behavioural patterns, like style and fashion, and social institutions, like love and marriage, serves to centralise power in the plays and also to exclude what I called outsiders. I have also attempted to show how Shakespeare's comedy inscribes its audience within these power structures, that is, how the plays themselves communicate via an unspoken covenant with their audience and how both in and outside the plays, this covenant is quite literally a gentleman's agreement. Such a blatantly inequitable arrangement has unsurprisingly caused some critics to reject the pat marriages as unsatisfactory conclusions. Norman N. Holland, writing of A Midsummer Night's Dream is anxious: 'I want these couples married at the end, but I don't see - I don't trust, really - the way the comedy gets them together. Out of infidelity comes fidelity - but how?' 37

V

At the end of As You Like It, Rosalind steps forward and modestly asserts the impropriety of a female being in such a position of authority as to have the last word: 'It is not the fashion to see the lady the epilogue' (Epilogue. 1). It certainly is not the fashion because as we have seen, fashion in Shakespearean comedy is a loaded word. She asks us how she might compel us to like the play:

My way is to conjure you; and I'll begin with the women. I charge you, O women, for the love you bear to men, to like as much of this play as please you; and I charge you, O men, for the love you bear to women - as I perceive by your simp'ring none of you hates them - that between you and the women the play may please.

(Epilogue. 11)

Rosalind celebrates the play as an event that unifies the two sexes. Women and men are exhorted by the love they bear to each other to love the play equally. We have seen that the love and especially the marriage that the play(s) feature, while it may be a marriage of true minds, is certainly not a true marriage of minds. Nevertheless, Rosalind assures us, the values that we share with each other are the values of the play. We may not approve of them, but we are expected to shoulder them in deference to the play's comic demands. Then, just when we thought we knew where we were, Rosalind continues:

If I were a woman, I would kiss as many of you as had beards that pleas'd me, complexions that lik'd me, and breaths that I defied not; and, I am sure, as many as have good beards, or good faces, or sweet breaths, will, for my kind offer, when I make curtsy, bid me farewell.

(Epilogue. 17)

Who is speaking this - Ganymede ('If I were a woman...'), Rosalind ('when I make curtsy'), or a boy actor, playing a girl, playing a boy? The epilogue, separated from the required suspension of disbelief which the rest of the play demands, is a suitable place to talk self-consciously about the play itself, and also, it would seem, to challenge the sexual categories which the drama assumes. The speaker of the epilogue confuses the definable sexual roles according to which, I have suggested, the whole play has 38 For an alternative reading of this moment, see chapter VIII.

---

structured itself. While we can argue that the epilogue foregrounds the maleness that, as De Beauvoir suggested, defines femaleness, and thus turns the drama itself (with its all-male cast) into a male preserve, this would overlook the attention that the speaker pays to the judgement of the women (s/he starts with them) as well as the necessity for men to take this female verdict into account ('I charge you, O men, for the love you bear to women...'). In the words of Valerie Traub, the effect of this moment 'is to highlight the constructedness of gender and the flexibility of erotic attraction at precisely the point when the formal impulse of comedy would be to essentialize and fix both gender and eroticism.'

In Much Ado and Twelfth Night, the plays end in a comparatively straightforward way: marriage confirms the consensus of patriarchy. In As You Like It, the epilogue fractures the confidence of consensus, and challenges us to decide the fate not only of the play itself, but because we are implicated within it, of the categories of female/male by which we judge the play and, more crucially, by which we live.

A poet's work [is] To name the unnameable, to point at frauds, to take sides, start arguments, shape the world and stop it from going to sleep.

The prophet/poet of The Satanic Verses clamouring to keep the world awake reformulates Auden's assertion with which we started: 'poetry makes nothing happen'. As You Like It is, in this sense, truly poetry, for the nothing that it makes happen, the unnameable with which it keeps us awake, is nothing less than our very own relationships to one another as women and men.

---

III

The Flaw in the Flaw

Shakespeare's Tragic Method and a Problem of Criticism

At the centre of Umberto Eco's medieval thriller, The Name of the Rose, lies a library. ¹

At the heart of this semiological maze is a book - a tract so jealously guarded that its protection and censorship cause the savage murder of anyone who gets close to it. The book is the companion volume to Aristotle's Poetics and contains the philosopher's account and analysis of comedy. For Jorge, the blind monk who hides, guards and eventually eats the book to stop others reading it, its existence threatens to undermine man's insecurity and his consequent religious faith. The monk explains the potentiality of laughter to defuse man's collective anxieties:

Laughter frees the villein from the fear of the Devil, because in the feast of fools the Devil also appears poor and foolish, and therefore controllable. But this book could teach that freeing oneself of the fear of the Devil is wisdom..... Laughter, for a few moments, distracts the villein from fear. But law is imposed by fear, whose true name is fear of God.... And from this book there could be born the new destructive aim to destroy death through redemption from fear.... if laughter is the delight of the plebeians, the licence of the plebeians must be restrained and humiliated, and intimidated by sterness. ²

---

² Ibid., pp. 474 - 475.
A humanity that laughs is a humanity that fails to take its plight seriously. A humanity that giggles at the absurdity of its own situation does not have imaginative space for a god. The blasted heath where Lear shouts and rails in a grotesquely comic way anticipates the morally and theatrically naked stage where Vladimir and Estragon wait absurdly for their Godot. When, in the rhetoric of the plays, the gods do appear, they do so only as sadistic schoolchildren or in careless recreation: 'As flies to wanton boys are we to th' gods - / They kill us for their sport' (King Lear, IV. i. 37 - 38) or as Bosola trenchantly puts it in Webster's play The Duchess of Malfi, 'We are merely the stars' tennis-balls, struck and banded / Which way please them.' From the very earliest literature, right up to Ted Hughes's Crow, mankind is presented as little more than laughable. Humanity is a walking joke for the superhuman (whether god, Crow or devil). But, as Jorge maintains, we should never be allowed to enjoy the joke.

The anarchy of comedy threatens to undermine authority - the authority of religious faith (as in Eco's novel) or the authority of other power structures. The feast of misrule in the classical world put slaves in authority over their masters for a single day. The slave in Caesar's chariot whose job it was to slap his emperor in the face comically deflated the very power structures which the ruler embodied. The Renaissance moralists who wrote against the theatre singled out comedy's propensity to undercut authority:

Comedyes make our delight exceede, for at them many times wee laugh so extreemely, that striuing to bridle our selues, wee cannot; therefore Plato affirmeth that great laughter breedeth a great change.

---

4 Stephen Gosson, Plays Confuted in fewe Actions, Proving that they are not to be suffred in a Christian common weale (London, 1582), F 5°.
Laughter subverts not just the State but individual self-control. Comedy turns the world upside down - transforms men into beasts (Bottom into an ass), and women into men (Rosalind into Ganymede, Viola into Cesario). Yet for all its radical potentiality to change social, political, cultural and religious structures, it is variously considered to be light, whimsical, trivial and escapist. This failure to take comedy seriously goes back a long way. Even the usually vituperative John Rainoldes underestimated the comic genre: 'I ... perhaps thinke with Plato, that the seeing of Comedies played can doe no harme, of tragedies may be dangerous.' The myth persists that if tragedy is serious, comedy is not. For the influential critic I. A. Richards, 'Tragedy is perhaps the most general, all accepting, all ordering experience known.... It is invulnerable.' Richards goes on to separate the highest examples of the genre from the lesser kinds; unsurprisingly, he distinguishes between 'almost all Elizabethan Tragedy [and] Shakespeare's six masterpieces'. Tragedy, of which Shakespearean tragedy is assumed especially by commentators earlier this century to be the most noble species, is grave, profound, forthright, tragic. Comedy, by contrast, offers relief - 'comic relief' - a lessening of dramatic tension, a moment of relaxation for the wracked and terrified audience of tragedy. As recently as 1986, we find this critical misconception being promulgated, 'comedy does not demand characters so highly developed and individuated as does tragedy'. Tragedy is, according to this analysis, the super-ordinate term of the two, containing within it disjointed and trivial comic interludes. Comedy becomes a subordinate device of the tragic scheme of things.

7 Ibid., p. 146.
The problems with this oversimplified separation are legion. In Shakespeare's drama we are not always offered the security of knowing when comedy is comedy and tragedy is tragedy. Without broaching the taxonomic difficulties of plays like Measure for Measure, The Merchant of Venice or Cymbeline (are they comedies or tragedies?) what do we do with apparent anomalies like the Porter in Macbeth, who amid the blasted nightmare of murder and savagery (a landscape where witches brew cauldrons, old men spout blood and horses eat each other,) jokes about the difficulty of achieving an erection when under the influence of alcohol? Where do we place the clown who refuses to leave the stage in the most compellingly tragic of all Shakespearean moments - Cleopatra's suicide - and hangs around to make lewd jokes about women enjoying the length of his worm? How do we account for the exchange in Othello between the musician and a clown who ribs him about the proximity of his tail and his wind instrument (an episode to which I will return below)? And what do we do about the fool in King Lear who persistently deflates the monarch's tragic pretensions with his stories of housewives beating eels on their heads and simpletons who, out of kindness, spread their horses' hay with butter? Comedy is not tragedy, nor tragedy comedy but their disparity does not preclude the possibility of their joint operation.

As we have seen in chapter II, comedy has the power to disrupt, it is anarchic, it substitutes given power structures and ideologies, with an inverted scheme of things. Relations between god and man, king and subject, men and women are turned inside out, upset and punctured. Comedy is anarchic because it questions ideology and may even (although, again, only temporarily in Shakespeare), replace it with an alternative one. The relationship of tragedy to ideology is quite different. If comedy defies ideology, tragedy endorses it. Graham Holderness explains:
Tragedy for Aristotle was really a form of cultural oppression, a means of ideological coercion by which the audience was invited to sympathise with the tragic hero in his challenging of law, morality or fate; and then required to cleanse that sympathy through an awed contemplation of the terrible consequences of the challenge. 9

For example, the audience empathise with the ambitious drive of Macbeth or the despondent deprivation of Hamlet. They are both attractive characters. Shakespeare, by giving them some of the best lines in the language, ensures that they are well received. The sympathy that Holdemess mentions is indeed forthcoming in each instance. Each hero kills a king and inevitably falls; what these tragedies offer is an object lesson in the evils of regicide. If royal murder, which is also a kind of patricide, can undo one as intellectually adroit as Hamlet, or as emotionally committed as Macbeth, then what on earth, were we to commit that horror, would happen to us? Holdemess concludes: 'The audience is meant to leave the theatre with all its immoral, antisocial and politically dissident impulses safely cauterised or quelled.' 10

History plays especially were instructive in the acceptable standards of social behaviour. The subtitle of Thomas Beard's Theatre of Gods Judgements clearly implies that tragedy befalls only those who deserve it: concerning the admirable judgement of God upon the transgressours of his commandments. Tragedy is, in this analysis, a form of social control. The plays tell us how not to behave. For Beard, the object lessons of history, which were popular material for contemporary dramatisation, demonstrated the errors of the past:

`historie is accounted a very necessary and profitable thing, for that in recalling to mind the truth of things past, which otherwise would be` buried in silence, it seteth before vs such effects (as warnings and admonitions touching good and euill) and laieth virtue and vice so naked before our eyes, with the punishments or rewards inflicted or bestowed upon the followers of each of them, that it may rightly be called, an easie and profitable apprenticeship or schoole for every man to learn to get wisdome at another mans cost. 11

---

Phillip Stubbes, whose Anatomy of Abuses published in 1583 contains a savage attack on the theatrical institutions of his day, at least concedes that some drama may contain this kind of historical object lesson and thus operate for the social good:

when honest & chast playes, tragedies, & enterluds are used to these ends, for the Godly recreation of the mind, for the good example of life, for the avoyding of that, which is evill, and learning of that which is good, than are they very tolerable exercyses. 12

It is no accident that Macbeth, written for a royal command performance and presented in front of a Scottish king, should be so uncompromising in its condemnation of regicides. Earlier in his career, when Shakespeare had dared to suggest that the usurper in Richard II may well have had grounds for his revolt, the play was heavily censored and the monarch, herself not at all amused, took the point: 'I am Richard II, know ye not that?' 13 In an age which brutally put to death those suspected of conspiring against the throne, the notion that Bolingbroke could depose and murder a king and not himself be publicly and ritualistically decapitated was indeed a dangerous one. Elizabeth's misgivings were well-founded. The night before the Essex rebellion in 1601 the conspirators gathered into the Globe and paid Shakespeare's company 40 shillings to watch this play of successful revolution.

In the classic account of Shakespearean tragedy the play focuses itself on the single eponymous hero and especially on what has become known as the 'fatal flaw'. Time after time critical accounts of what have become the four major tragedies focus on Hamlet's procrastination, Othello's jealousy, Lear's naive desire to quantify love or Macbeth's ambition. These single faults in otherwise admirable characters bring about the terrible collapse of the Shakespearean world; but tragedy has not always been like this. In Chaucer's The Monk's Tale humanity grabs onto the revolving Wheel of Fortune; first rising to the apex then descending to depravity.

I wol biwaille, in manere of tragedie,
The harm of hem that stooed in heigh degree,
And fillen so that there nas no remedie
To brynge hem out of hir adversitee.
For certein, whan that Fortune list to flee,
Ther may no man the cours of hire with-holde.
Lat no man truste on blynde prosperitee;
Be war by thise ensamples trewe and olde. 14

Although this fall is moralised - Fortuna has no hold upon the faithful at heart - this rise and fall is part of the order of things; no little flaws or faults lurking inwardly which threaten to undermine the foundations of the universe. No less tragic perhaps - but a good deal less complicated!

From the Romantic period onwards, Shakespeare's art as a dramatist was analysed in terms of the involved theories of the 'Romantic Imagination'.

---

13 According to Stubbes, regicide was out of the question even as a method of deposing a tyrant. 'For whether the prince be wicked or godlye, hee is sent of GOD ... if hee be a tyrant, then is he raised of GOD for a scourge to the people for their sinnes.' (The Second Part of The Anatomy of Abuses (London, 1583), D I.)

playwright's craft became conflated with complex deliberation over ideas such as 'Imagination' or 'Nature'. Coleridge attributed Shakespeare's talents to Nature in a passage which displays the origins of the essentialism which was to become the hallmark of Shakespearean criticism thereafter:

> Nature, the prime genial artist, inexhaustible in diverse powers, is equally inexhaustible in forms. Each exterior is the physiognomy of the being within, its true image reflected and thrown out from the concave mirror. And even such is the appropriate excellence of her chosen poet, of our own Shakespeare, himself a nature humanized, a genial understanding directing self-consciously a power and an implicit wisdom deeper than consciousness.

This process of dramatic composition with its 'power and ... implicit wisdom deeper than consciousness' is typical of the internalisation of artistic creativity more generally. In an age in which the greatest literary achievement was a poem subtitled the 'Growth of a Poet's Mind, An Autobiographical Poem' (The Prelude), this shift to introspection should not really surprise us. The tragedies of these plays thus became related not to the externality of Fortune's Wheel, but to something inherent in the very constitution of the tragic protagonist. The tragedy of Macbeth happens because of something rooted as firmly inside him as his bone marrow - his characteristic fatal flaw.

Following the Romantics, A. C. Bradley was a keen promoter of analysing the heroic personality's innards for clues as to their faults. For Bradley, tragedy arose out of a character's flaw and they were real characters. Of Othello, for example, Bradley writes:

> In the first place, Othello's mind, for all its poetry, is very simple. He is not observant. His nature tends outward.... In the second place, for all his nature and massive calm (and he has greater dignity than any other of Shakespeare's men), he is by nature full of the most vehement

---

Bradley's emphasis on human nature is directly descended from Coleridge's own description of Shakespeare as 'himself a nature humanized'. This process of humanising is extended to Shakespeare's tragic protagonists. Thus Othello is (note the present tense) a recognisable person, with his own 'nature', habits and propensities. He is not a character in a drama; he is a man with 'greater dignity than any other of Shakespeare's men.' For Bradley, Shakespeare never wrote characters, but men; never figures in a drama but people in a world as real as this one. They are people brought down by a coincidence of unfortunate circumstances and their fatal flaw. Implicit in this kind of approach is the assumption that Macbeth would not have overreached himself if he had been less ambitious, that Othello would not have killed his wife unless he had been a 'jealous type'. They behaved thus because, Bradley would say, it was in their nature to do so - their characters demanded it of them. Even if one ignores its psychological naiveté, this attitude is dangerously unsound in two further ways - dramaturgically and politically.

In the first place it renders the dramatic relationships that Shakespeare so carefully constructs meaningless. If Othello is an interesting play, it is partly so because of the mystery of Iago and the relationship between servant and master that inspires the murder of the innocent mistress. If the fault is inherent in the hero himself, Iago ceases to contribute to the action of the play or the morality of its world. Othello's flaws would have precipitated the murder of his wife anyway - likewise we can edit out the ghost of King Hamlet and the witches in Macbeth. Of course this makes complete nonsense of the plays and saddles the tragic heroes with a deterministic involuntariness.

---

Politically the notion of the fatal flaw is dangerous because it places the entire responsibility for the actions of the character squarely and totally on his/her shoulders. In other words, Macbeth's evil is a facet of his personality and nothing can be done about it. Such a sociology proposes that there is no possibility of social amelioration, that education is a waste of time, that interpersonal relationships are futile and that everyone is self-interested and isolated. It is a sociality required by the mechanisms of capitalism.

The obsessive emphasis that Thatcherism placed on individuality and 'Enterprise' is part of this divisive philosophy. In 1989 Mrs Thatcher spoke in an ITV interview with Brian Walden about what she called the 'British character': 'it's enterprising, it's responsible, it will take the initiative it wants to look after its own family, [it] wants to make its own decisions.' If your fatal flaw is your own concern then no one should be burdened with having to help you out. If you are so weak that you cannot stand on your own two feet then you go to the wall. The literary critical devise of the 'fatal flaw' plays directly into a politics which abnegates responsibility to others in the social group. In an interview that took place in 1987, Mrs Thatcher said

I think we've been through a period where too many people have been given to understand that if they have a problem, it's the government's job to cope with it. 'I have a problem, I'll get a grant.' I'm homeless, the government must house me.' They're casting their problem on society. And you know, there's no such thing as society. There are individual men and women and there are families.

The final problem with the notion of the fatal flaw is that it internalises Shakespearean drama. It mystifies it, placing the dynamics of its ebb and flow firmly within the unlit

---

17 For further discussion of capitalism in relation to the early modern period, see chapter VII.
18 Since the resignation of Margaret Thatcher, this idea has been reformulated in John Major's 'society of equal opportunities' which one wit glossed as a society in which everyone has an equal chance to become unequal!
harbour of the protagonist's character. Is this flaw behavioural, psychological, emotional? The fatal flaw remains nebulous, written in invisible ink between the lines in front of us. The assertion that the fatal flaw is there at all is extraordinary given Shakespeare's contempt for the abstract. Critics have the time in the comfort of a library, in the security of a study to ponder at length over speeches looking with magnifying glasses for signals of the fatal flaw. An audience in the theatre just does not have time to perceive the critical problems in the same way. Shakespeare's drama was written (unlike Milton's for example) for the stage not for the study. Shakespeare is bluntly, most of the time crudely, concrete and it is this concreteness especially in terms of physicality that I now wish to consider.

III

'You promised to tell me your history, you know,' said Alice...'Mine is a long and a sad tale!' said the Mouse, turning to Alice and sighing. 'It is a long tail, certainly,' said Alice, looking down with wonder at the Mouse's tail; 'but why do you call it sad?'

Alice's confusion accidentally, but not incorrectly, locates the origin of narrative power in the body itself. The homophonic tale and tail bring about the fusion of the historical with the bodily - force together, until they converge, discourse and physicality. Shakespeare's characters are continually validating what they say with what they organically are, habitually equating their speech with their bodies. At the beginning of Richard II, for example, Bolingbroke accuses Mowbray of lying. He threatens literally to make him eat his words: 'With a foul traitor's name stuff I thy throat' (I. i. 44) and

---

21 Lewis Carroll, Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, Through the Looking Glass and Other Writings, introduced by Robin Denniston (London and Glasgow, 1954), pp. 43 - 44. Shakespeare uses the same pun in The Two Gentlemen of Verona (II. iii. 40 - 42) and The Taming of the Shrew (II. i. 210 - 216). Generally for Shakespeare, and in both these instances, tail meant 'pudend'.
asserts that 'what I speak / My body shall make good' (ll. 36 - 37). Words are just too slippery to be believed; we can never be sure of what has been said. Physicality on the other hand is objective and determinate. At the opening of Macbeth, Duncan seizes upon the equivalence of what is said with what is corporal. Addressing the Bloody Sergeant, he remarks: 'So well thy words become thee as thy wounds; / They smack of honour both' (I. ii. 44 - 45). The Bloody Sergeant himself is unable to speak further but his very body calls out for assistance: 'I cannot tell - / But I am faint; my gashes cry for help' (ll. 42 - 43). Similarly in his supremely understated incitement to riot, Mark Antony disclaims his oratorical skills and relocates them in the gaping cuts of the body in front of him:

(III. ii. 225 - 230, my emphases)

Previously in the same play, Casca has quite literally vocalised his political aspirations through his destructive dexterity: 'Speak, hands, for me!' (III. i. 76 - note the similar formulation - bodily parts speaking). Even the lowly Third Citizen in Coriolanus recognises the irresistible rhetorical force of wounds. He asserts that they are unable to deny Coriolanus their voices, 'for if he show us his wounds and tell us his deeds, we are to put our tongues into those wounds and speak for them' (II. iii. 6). Wounds in Shakespeare speak louder than words. Again, this time in I Henry IV, wounds not words pay testament to sincerity. Hotspur tells the king that Mortimer's bravery is evident in the physical mutilation that he has suffered in the king's name:
Revolted Mortimer!
He never did fall off, my sovereign liege,
But by the chance of war; to prove that true,
Needs no more but one tongue for all those wounds,
Those mouthed wounds, which valiantly he took
When on the gentle Severn's sedgy bank,
In single opposition hand to hand,
He did confound the best part of an hour
In changing hardiment with great Glendower....
Never did base and rotten policy
Colour her working with such deadly wounds;
Nor never could the noble Mortimer
Receive so many, and all willingly.
Then let him not be slandered with revolt.
(I. iii. 93 - 112, my emphases)

When Antonio pledges his purse and his person to his friend Bassanio, he is prepared to have his body mutilated for the love of his friend. Bassanio attributes a gory physicality to the letter which tells him of the wreck of Antonio's argosy. He addresses Portia, 'Here is a letter, lady, / The paper as the body of my friend, / And every word in it a gaping wound / Issuing life-blood' (III. ii. 265 - 268). Bassanio like Hotspur judges by the body.

In the drama of Shakespeare, what we experience all the time is not simply body language in the sense of gesture or movement - though this is obviously an element of performance - but much more fundamentally, body-talk. The texts themselves repeatedly foreground their interest in bodies and bodily parts. Shylock's nose, Antonio's heart, Gloucester's eyes, Bardolph's complexion, Barnadine's head, Lavinia's tongue and hands, Cordelia's voice, Helena's height, Richard III's deformity, Cleopatra's breast, Duncan's blood, Cloten's headless corpse, Yorick's skull, Lady Macbeth's nipple, Aguecheek's haircut, Olivia's schedule of beauty, Toby's broken pate, the colour of Othello's 'sooty bosom' and 'thick lips', and so on and so on. Shakespeare's most common joke is physical. The sets of identical twins from The Comedy of Errors and Twelfth Night, are really visual puns while the recapitation of Bottom with an ass's head is a bizarre kind of malapropism. When Stephen Greenblatt writes that 'Shakespearean comedy constantly appeals to the body', he is only partly right. These examples illustrate that there is no genre in which Shakespeare does not foreground bodily concerns. Valerie Traub has recently noted this Shakespearean propensity to concentrate on the physical. She writes, 'Shakespeare's language metaphorizes and materializes desire.... The drama's fascination with and dependence on body parts ... reiterates what I shall call his propensity toward "metaphorizing materialization."' She uses this terminology to demonstrate the 'persistent interest of his drama in the material and relational contexts in which "desire" is produced, sustained, and displaced.' Her account is rightly predicated upon the centrality of the Shakespearean body.

Shakespeare's most extended physical joke is of course Falstaff. Addressed by names that suit his physicality, Falstaff becomes 'Sack-and-Sugar Jack', 'Chops' and so on. 'Falstaff sweats to death,' says the Prince during the Gadshill robbery, 'And lards the lean earth as he walks along' (II. ii. 104 - 105). Falstaff himself uses his obesity as a comic ploy. The Lord Chief Justice challenges him at the beginning of Part II: 'Your means are very slender, and your waste is great.' Falstaff takes up the challenge and, like Alice's confusion over the Mouse's tail, he opts for the wrong definition: 'I would it were otherwise; I would my means were greater and my waist slenderer' (I. ii. 133 - 135). Shakespeare was evidently fond of the pun. In The Merry Wives of Windsor as Falstaff tells Pistol and Nim of his plan to woo and exploit Mistresses Ford and Page, he remarks,

24 Ibid., p. 13.
25 A number of valuable essays on the subject of the body in Renaissance culture, ranging from anatomy to architecture are available in Renaissance Bodies: The Human Figure in English Culture c. 1540 - 1660, edited by Lucy Gent and Nigel Llewellyn (London, 1990).
'I am in the waist two yards about. But I am now about no waste; I am about thrift' (I. iii. 37). At the crucial moment Falstaff recognises the futility of linguistic and hence socialised reward in the face of physical injury. He uses his bulk to shield himself from the dangerous possibilities of war. Unlike the Bloody Sergeant, Mortimer or Caesar, Falstaff shuns the wounds that command the respect of his fellows:

honour pricks me on. Yea, but how if honour prick me off when I come on? How then? Can honour set to a leg? No. Or an arm? No. Or take away the grief of a wound? No. Honour hath no skill in surgery, then? No. What is honour? A word. What is in that word? Honour. What is that honour? Air. A trim reckoning. Who hath it? He that died o' Wednesday. Doth he feel it? No. Doth he hear it? No. 'Tis insensible, then? Yea, to the dead. But will it not live with the living? No. Why? Detraction will not suffer it. Therefore I'll none of it. Honour is a mere scutcheon. And so ends my catechism.

(Henry IV, V. i. 127 - 140)

Honour is interrogated according to the absolute standard of physical well-being and, in Falstaff's scheme of things, suffers a poor second.

The process of gradual demise which Falstaff undergoes throughout the course of the two parts of Henry IV is, not surprisingly, manifest in terms of his weakening physicality. He notes his own physical ruination quite early on: 'Do I not bate [i.e., abate, grow thin]? Do I not dwindle? Why, my skin hangs about me like an old lady's loose gown; I am withered like an old apple-john' (Part I, III. iii. 2). Our first sight of him in Part II is with a urine sample that he has just received from the doctor and all is not well. The Chief Justice roundly confirms that he is past his prime, cataloguing in a kind of parodic blazon his physical decrepitude:

Do you set down your name in the scroll of youth, that are written down old with all the characters of age? Have you not a moist eye, a dry hand, a yellow cheek, a white beard, a decreasing leg, an increasing belly? Is not your voice broken, your wind short, your chin double, your wit single, and every part about you blasted with antiquity?

(I. ii. 167 - 172)

The development of Falstaff's physical ailments signifies the growing tragic momentum of II Henry IV. This is also the situation, but much more viciously, in the case of Pandarus. The desperate state of Troilus and Cressida's affair, which he has fostered and promoted from the beginning, is inseparable from the decline of his own body:

A whoreson tisick [throat or lung disorder], a whoreson rascally tisick so troubles me, and the foolish fortune of this girl; and what one thing, what another, that I shall leave you one o' th's days; and I have a rheum in mine eyes too, and such an ache in my bones that unless a man were curs'd, I cannot tell what to think on't.

(V. iii. 101 - 106)

The play, perhaps Shakespeare's most cynical tragedy, ends with Pandarus bequeathing us his diseases. Troilus's savage ending and the pathos surrounding the final rejection of Falstaff, make inseparable the tragic outcomes and the physical decline of the plays' 'chorus' figures. Pandarus's and Falstaff's bodies are only the most obvious examples of Shakespeare's corporal interest. This is not just a casual theme of Shakespeaean drama, but an essential concern, for as Falstaff's speech on honour demonstrates, what the plays continually assert is that physicality, not history, the tail not the tale is the only verifiable reality. The clown of Othello makes this disgustingly clear:

Clow: Are these, I pray, call'd wind-instruments?
Musi: Ay, marry, are they, sir.
Clow: O, thereby hangs a tail.
Musi: Whereby hangs a tale, sir?
Clow: Marry, sir, by many a wind-instrument that I know.

(III. i. 6 - 10)
This moment enforces the importance of the Shakespearean body for a reading of this scene. There is no need for the abstract critical machinery of fatal flaws - because Shakespeare cites his drama in the physicality of his scripts and the actors speaking them. The drama is concretised in front of us - literally, in the flesh. Linguistic accuracy is predicated on the very physicality which articulates it.

It follows then that those characters who are without bodies are the most deceptive in their use of language. Ariel, Puck, the ghost of King Hamlet, are continually eluding the attempts to tie them down to a single linguistic truth. Macbeth's witches are bearded sisters who vanish into air bubbles as they wish and this physical ambiguity reflects their linguistic sleight of hand. Ironically it is the witches who fully understand the complexities and constraints of language. Highly patterned and prophetic, their speeches represent not so much a violation of language as an adroit exploitation of it. They deceive Macbeth not by lying but by telling him the truth, albeit they are being 'economical' with it. They are 'imperfect speakers' but they are not dishonest ones.

Physicality and language go quite literally hand in hand in Shakespeare's plays. At the end of Henry V the English king is mistrusted by the French princess: 'Your Majestee ave fausse French enough to deceive de most sage damoiselle dat is en France' (V. ii. 217). Henry's plain speaking is an attempt to reassure her of his blunt and therefore honest desire for her. It is indeed significant that previously the only English lesson we have witnessed is her translation of bodily parts; in III. ii she has learned 'd'hand, de fingre, de nails, d'arm, d'elbow, de nick, de sin, de foot, le count' (III. iv. 55). Bodies can puncture the deceptiveness of speech and of course permeate the infinite nuances of 26 In his edition of the play Gary Taylor notes the explicit double entendres, again linked to physicality, of the Princess's speech. Henry V (Oxford, 1984) p. 179.

---

linguistic competence. The comfort that Katherine has in the face of Henry's deceptive tongue is that a hand is a hand is a hand in whatever language it occurs.

In his penetrating study of the emergence of a linguistic subjectivity (entitled significantly for our purposes The Tremulous Private Body), Francis Barker notes that the act of writing separates the self from the wider social context. He says:

> The very writing, which as its epistemological principle grasps the outer world as an accessible transparency, recedes from that world towards an inner location where the soul - or, as the modern terminology has it, positionality in discourse - apparently comes to fill the space of meaning and desire. 27

What Barker means by this is that through language the self recognises itself as a separate entity from the world and others. The 'T' which is able to speak carves out for itself a space or subject position from which it is able to demand and receive more or less autonomy. Language is, according to this analysis, a vehicle for the formulation and expression of power. Those who can speak are those who can rule.

The histories and the tragedies in particular, are concerned with the importance of linguistic/political competence. Hal is a powerful king precisely because he has served his apprenticeship as a student of different languages. He describes the process to Poins:

> when I am King of England I shall command all the good lads in Eastcheap. They call drinking deep, dyeing scarlet; and when you breathe in your watering they cry 'hem!' and bid you play it off. To conclude, I am so good a proficient in one quarter of an hour that I can drink with any tinker in his own language during my life.

(II. iv. 13 - 18, my emphases)

Later in the same play, Hotspur taunts the Welsh leader of the rebellion by attacking his English fluency. Glendower sharply replies, 'I can speak English, lord, as well as you, / For I was train'd up in the English court' (III. i. 121 - 122). An inability to communicate, to speak the right language, isn't merely a political handicap; Mortimer moans later in the same scene 'This is the deadly spite that angers me: / My wife can speak no English, I no Welsh' (II. 192 - 193). In the histories those that are powerful are those that can speak the languages of others. In Henry V, the King has successfully learnt to galvanise and unite Welsh, Scottish, Irish and English soldiers. Language, as the play Richard II insists, is power. As Richard relents and commutes Bolingbroke's banishment from ten years to six, the defendant comments on the awesome power of the King's speech: 'Four lagging winters and four wanton springs / End in a word: such is the breath of Kings' (I. iii. 214 - 215). Hamlet too is a prince who speaks across many different social registers. We see and hear of him chatting to the players, the gravediggers, the Norwegian captain and the pirates ('these good fellows') all in their own language. When Claudius says 'He's lov'd of the distracted multitude' (IV. iii. 4) we know why - because he speaks to them in a language that they can understand; to use a cliché, he relates to them.

At the other extreme are those in Shakespeare who are inarticulate and hence politically impotent. Mortimer's wife and Queen Katherine are marginalised in two ways - they are women and they are unable to speak the right language. Shakespeare's two most famous blacks are similarly deprived of the language with which to voice political power. Caliban in The Tempest like thousands of the dispossessed in the golden age of exploration - the Renaissance - is colonised and oppressed. Taught the language of the white invader, he is subjected to its grammar:

---

28 For further discussion of this passage, see chapter VI.
You taught me language, and my profit on't
Is, I know how to curse. The red plague rid you
For learning me your language!

(I. ii. 363 - 365)

Othello too is linguistically muzzled:

Rude am I in my speech,
And little blest with the set phrase of peace;
For since these arms of mine had seven years' pith
... they have us'd
Their dearest action in the tented field;
And little of this great world can I speak
More than pertains to feats of broil, and battle;
And therefore little shall I grace my cause
In speaking for myself.

(I. iii. 81 - 89)

Othello with the emphasis on his 'arms' replaces linguistic with physical competence. Othello's descriptions of his war conquests which win Desdemona are not epic or poetic, they are steeped in physicality - 'She'd come again, and with a greedy ear / Devour up my discourse' (I. iii. 149 - 150) - his speech is as substantial as food. Othello specifically relates his poor command of the language of courtly love to his racial identity: 'for I am black / And have not those soft parts of conversation / That chamberers have' (III. iii. 267 - 269).

As well as race, sex can serve to censor the speaking of Shakespearean characters. In her study of gender and Renaissance drama, The Subject of Tragedy, Catherine Belsey relates this dramatical silence to the social position of woman in early modern England. Women, she writes, were enjoined to silence, discouraged from any form of speech which was not an act of submission to the authority of their fathers or husbands. Permitted to break their silence in order to acquiesce in the utterances of others, women were denied any single place from which to speak for themselves.... While the autonomous subject of liberalism was in the making, women had no single or stable place from which to define themselves as independent beings. In this sense they both were and were not subjects. 29

Cordelia, Desdemona and Ophelia are all censored into nothing. As the royal Lear turns to his youngest daughter for a reply to draw an opulent third of his kingdom she replies, quite literally with 'Nothing'. She says nothing and she says 'Nothing'. As Desdemona explains to the patriarchs of her love for Othello, she pleads that they will lend her voice a 'gracious ear'. The Duke immediately interrupts compelling her to speak (I. iii. 247).
Later Desdemona says of Emilia, 'Alas! she has no speech' - and this of someone who is positively shrewish in comparison with herself! The whole of the final scene is a protracted study of the issues of speaking, lying and censorship. Iago's final words indicate that having been discovered, his is now a position untenable in the society in which he exists. There is no choice but to censor himself and expel himself from the society of speaking men: 'Demand me nothing. What you know, you know. / From this time forth I never will speak word' (V. ii. 306 - 307). Ophelia too is consistently censored and silenced. Her longest public speeches are her mad songs which rail not surprisingly at the sexual inequality of her society. She sings of predatory men tumbling country girls and of violated virginity. In the 1989 Leicester Haymarket production (directed by Yuri Lyubimov, see plate A) she approached the patriarchal ruler, Claudius himself and sang accusingly 'By Cock, they are to blame.' Women, then, are linguistically and politically impotent. It is worth reminding ourselves that the only really powerful woman in Shakespeare, Lady Macbeth has asked the gods to unsex her, to convert her into a sexless monster.

29 Catherine Belsey, The Subject of Tragedy: Identity and Difference in Renaissance Drama, (London and New York, 1985), pp. 149-50.
Barker's analysis of the linguistic construction of a subjective position can be coupled with the notion of the physicality of language that we have considered above. If power resides in language which is in turn ratified by the physicality of the speaker, then it follows that the amount of power that characters wield may be related to their bodily shape. Edmund's realisation of his political aspirations is intimately related to his physical attractiveness to the warring princesses. By choosing to sleep with one or other sister, he is able to fashion his own political advancement:

To both these sisters have I sworn my love;
Each jealous of the other, as the stung
Are of the adder. Which one of them shall I take?
Both? one? or neither? Neither can by enjoy'd,
If both remain alive: to take the widow,
Exasperates, makes mad her sister Goneril;
And hardly shall I carry out my side,
Her husband being alive. Now then, we'll use
His countenance for the battle; which being done,
Let her who would be rid of him devise
His speedy taking off.

(V. i. 55 - 65)

Edmund moves in this speech from a self-satisfied lust to a coldly political and manipulative calculation on the relative advantages of bedding one or other woman.

These examples ought to have made clear that Shakespeare sites his drama essentially in the web of relations between the linguistic and the bodily. The inscrutability of 'fatal flaws' and the like serves only to occlude the straightforward, though not necessarily uncomplicated, dramaturgy of the physical. As if we needed it, the plays provide us with one more crucial distraction from the red herring of fatal flaws - the technique of metadrama.
When Hamlet instructs the players before the performance of The Mousetrap in Elsinor, he promotes what we might call a mimetic view of the drama: 'Suit the action to the word, the word to the action; with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty of nature' (III. ii. 16 - 18). For Hamlet as a theatre director, drama should 'hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to nature; to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure' (III. ii. 22, my emphasis). Action for Hamlet should be naturalistic, as true to life as possible, an undistorting mirror. At the other extreme is the play staged by the rude mechanicals in A Midsummer Night's Dream. The 'tedious brief scene of young Pyramus and his love Thisbe' consistently ruptures its own fictionality. The play is symbolical, a man standing for moonshine, another for a wall. It is prefaced by a speech which begs the court's indulgence and apologises for the shortcomings of the actors. Throughout, Bottom and the other players puncture the illusion of drama as they announce that the lion is not really a lion and that Pyramus has not really killed himself.

If Hamlet's is an illusionistic dramaturgy that wishes to pretend it is not there, that aspires to erase itself and simply reflect the world, Bottom's is a theatre that continually announces its own presence and goads its audience into the recognition that mimesis on stage is never without the accompanying artifice of theatre. In other words, while Hamlet's theatre aspires to nature, Bottom's recognises that theatre is art. Shakespeare's own drama is of course closer to that of Bottom than of Hamlet. Plays like Henry V continually and explicitly announce their own fictionality. Pericles is structured around

---

30 For further discussion of this insert play, see chapter V.
the regular interpolations of a poet, Gower, who has previously written the story that Shakespeare is dramatising in the play. As well as in Hamlet and A Midsummer Night's Dream, masques and smaller 'insert plays' occur in The Merchant of Venice, Love's Labour's Lost, The Tempest, Henry VIII, and so on. The Taming of the Shrew is one single artificial play performed for the benefit of Christopher Sly, which the audience happens (in the scheme of the play) to oversee.

Hamlet of course protests too much. While Hamlet's (the actor's) view of the drama is mimetic, Hamlet (the play itself) is quite the opposite. It is a play about plays; a play in which its central player becomes a director. Hamlet's view of the drama is radically inconsistent with the drama that contains it; and indeed the prince's own dramatic theory is logically defective. On the one hand, he says, drama should hold the mirror up to nature. Drama becomes moral, spiritual, theological, philosophical, abstract and general. On the other hand, it should have a localised satirical purpose - to scourge 'the very age and body of the time'. By allowing us to glimpse this theatrical tension, the playwright is questioning the very notion of drama as an illusion of reality at all. As one recent critic notes, Hamlet's advice to the players 'seems curiously inappropriate to its theatrical context: an actor obeying every principle of Hamlet's dramatic theory would simply not be able to play the rôle of Hamlet'. For example it would be difficult to deliver the lines about drinking hot blood in such a way so as to 'o'erstep not the modesty of nature.' The Murder of Gonzago or (as Hamlet prefers to call it) The Mousetrap, features all of the standard ingredients of the revenge drama - the genre to which Hamlet itself belongs - a dumb-show, a pronounced morality, virtue and vice figures, etc.: thus the inserted play is self-consciously drawing attention to the play which contains it as a play in a particular dramatic tradition.

Near the beginning of the play, the prince tells his mother that he is no actor. I know not 'seems', he says,

"Tis not alone my inky cloak, good mother,
Nor customary suits of solemn black,
Nor windy suspiration of forc'd breath,
No, nor the fruitful river in the eye,
Nor the dejected haviour of the visage,
Together with all forms, moods, shapes of grief,
That can denote me truly. These indeed seem,
For they are actions that a man might play;
But I have that within which passeth show -
These but the trappings and the suits of woe.

(I. ii. 77 - 86)

Hamlet casts himself as a sincere doer, not a pretentious actor. Later in the play the prince curses himself for his own procrastination and his pale commitment next to an actor who mourns for Hecuba, or rather performs a mourning:

What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
That he should weep for her? What would he do,
Had he the motive and the cue for passion
That I have? He would drown the stage with tears,
And cleave the general ear with horrid speech

(II. ii. 552 - 556)

---

The prince protests that he is no actor, but he discovers that he is worse than one - he is a ham. After the players scene we would expect Hamlet's self-contempt to galvanise him into performing the murder that he has promised himself. Instead, of all things, he decides to direct a play!

This concern with acting and the dynamics of the stage is something that Shakespeare is especially keen to explore. Jaques's 'All the world's a stage' is a prime example of this, but it is in the tragedies that this metaphor for the world, the theatrum mundi, is interrogated most pessimistically. Lear equates the brevity of life with that of a play, 'When we are born, we cry that we are come / To this great stage of fools' (IV. vi. 183 - 184). This was a sentiment that Sir Walter Ralegh had expressed in his Calvinist misery in a poem on the same theme:

What is our life? A play of passion.
And what our mirth but music of division?
Our mothers' wombs the tiring-houses be
Where we are drest for this short comedy.
Heaven the judicious sharp spectator is
Who sits and marks what here we do amiss.
The graves that hide us from the searching sun
Are like drawn curtains when the play is done.
Thus playing post we to our latest rest,
And then we die, in earnest, not in jest. 32

Shakespeare's most famous formulation of the absurdity of dramatic life occurs in what is possibly his most repellent and disturbing play, Macbeth:

To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow,
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day
To the last syllable of recorded time,
And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
The way to dusty death. Out, out, brief candle!

I have tried to show through the examination of the issues of physicality and its relationship to speaking and metadrama, that the shady notion of the fatal flaw is an intangibility that we, as critics of Shakespearean drama, should be wary of. We have so much of the drama under our noses - the bodies in front of us, the lines that the actors speak and finally the self-allusion of the drama itself, that it seems perverse to start talking of psychologies and personality faults. The plays continually insist that they are plays, about fictional characters, performed on a stage by actors. If, like Bradley, we choose to ignore this insistence then the personalities that we discuss are only creations of our own imagination and moreover are likely to be the receptacles for the projection of our own personality disorders.

The tragic flaw is itself tragically flawed, 'full of sound and fury, / Signifying nothing.' Aristotle himself is clear about the importance of subjecting the characters in a drama to its overall coherence as a drama: 'The first essential, the life and soul, so to speak, of Tragedy is the Plot; and ... the Characters come second'. As Hamlet puts it so concisely, 'The play's the thing.'

---

IV

Sexual Geography of the Renaissance

On the Imagery of Antony and Cleopatra

Though he [Antony] be painted one way like a Gorgon,
The other way's a Mars.

(II. v. 115 - 116)

Antony and Cleopatra enjoys the dubious reputation of being Shakespeare's most ambiguous drama. A sample of critical explorations yields the following remarks:

The safest statement we can make about this play is that Shakespeare's ambivalence towards the characters, and towards their points of view, values, and modes of action, is extreme.... the marked and pervasive ambivalence which infuses the entire work.... in essence Antony and Cleopatra, at its greatest moments, is gloriously senseless. ¹

[A] painful ambivalence ... characterises our response to the play.... [The play moves] in a dialectical process that begins with experiment and ends in failure.... This hurts. ²

Antony and Cleopatra is one of those plays of Shakespeare which evoke a highly complex and ambiguous response.... subtle and elusive, mercurial and even fidgety.... [For Antony] the structure of Reality in itself is bewilderingly Kaleidoscopic. 3

---

[Antony and Cleopatra] offers a pliancy of vision outreaching the empirical. 4

The play seems perfectly calculated to offend the rising tide of neoclassical taste and to disappoint rational expectation.... Shakespeare insists upon ... ambivalence, for it is not simply the characteristic of his heroine but also the informing principle of the entire dramatic structure. 5

The whole of Antony and Cleopatra overflows the measure; in its interpretative openness, its expansive playfulness, [and] its imaginative abundance. 6

The title of Janet Adelman's influential study of Antony and Cleopatra, is designed to foreground incertitude as one of the play's central features: The Common Liar. 7 Its first chapter is a detailed sifting of the drama's deceptive possibilities: 'Uncertainty and Judgement'. For a number of critics this confusing polysemy is a symptom of the play's mixing of genres. Constance Brown Kuriyama writes, 'Falling roughly between the four great tragedies and the late romances, and clearly a transitional piece of some sort, Antony and Cleopatra partakes freely of both worlds'. 8 For Peter Erickson, the play threatens to turn into a hybrid "mongrel tragi-comedy" that falls between the two main generic categories'. He goes on (in a manner close to that of Kuriyama), 'it is convenient to call it a "transitional play," halfway between tragedy and late romance.'

Another explanation of the ambiguities of the play is founded upon its double setting, 'geographically, the main theatres are two: Egypt (the Eastern world) and Rome (the Western World). Frequently these play-worlds are associated straightforwardly with the two sexes, The conflict dramatized in Antony and Cleopatra is partly expressed through the contrast which Shakespeare establishes immediately between the flowing, feminine world of Egypt and the masculine, structured world of Rome.' This uncomplicated dichotomy is only half-right however, for just as each of the geographical settings is distinct from its own 'other', so it recognises itself as defined against that other. Thus, within the play itself there are no fewer than four competing points of view:

- Rome of Rome: martial, virile, noble, ordered
- Egypt of Rome: barren, frigid, pompous
- Rome of Egypt: effeminate, salacious, politically and sexually unstable
- Egypt of Egypt: fertile, exotic, fecund.

The audience is presented with all four of these viewpoints simultaneously and the final victory of Rome over Egypt is ambiguously open: the Romans do increase their empire and enlarge their governmental influence, but who wants a kingdom where nothing is left remarkable beneath the visiting moon? The world of Octavius is literally the world of love turned upside down: ROMA | AMOR.

---

10. Ansari, 'Antony and Cleopatra: An Image of Liquification', p. 79.
12. I am grateful to Richard Wilson for this suggestion.
Antony and Cleopatra is built upon a mesh of imagery and the structural dialectic of the play (Rome versus Egypt) is the genesis of the double standard upon which so much of that imagery rests. A curiously prolific image is that of liquidity (water, clouds, melting, fading light, the sea, the Tiber and the Nile). This motif is thematically appropriate because, like the truth of the play, it remains elusive and indeterminable. The particular image then does not form a consistent correlative for something, rather it is redefined upon each occasion and is thus environmentally conditioned. There is a similar indeterminacy surrounding imagery of sailing. For example, Agrippa says of Antony that 'A rarer spirit never / Did steer humanity' (V. i. 31 - 32). Antony is imaged as a reliable helmsman, a competent national leader. Previously however, Antony had been likened to a ruined ship; contemplating Cleopatra's apparent denial of Antony, Enobarbus murmurs, 'Sir, sir, thou art so leaky / That we must leave thee to thy sinking, for / Thy dearest quit thee' (III. xiii. 63 - 65). These two antithetical metaphors do not contend, rather they coexist and their very coexistence re-emphasises the abnegation of absolute standards by which we can evaluate the actions that take place in front of us.

The significance of this inconsistency in the use of imagery must be seen in the context of some radically anti-sceptical traditions in Renaissance thought. In his study of the mechanisms of human apprehension, The Order of Things, Foucault discusses the correspondences, the parallels between different hierarchies of phenomena that were apparent to the Renaissance mind: 'resemblance played a constructive role in the knowledge of Western culture.' 13 This idea found expression in the well-known speculations of the Neoplatonists. From the late fifteenth century the Florentine Humanists developed the theory that classical mythology concealed the Platonic wisdom of the ancients; that God could be reached through contemplation of physical beauty.

---

The creator could be glimpsed through his creation and the landscape was thus a symbol of holy harmony. The 'Neoplatonic quest for unity' proposed that Nature and Art owe their power to God and that, while Art imitates Nature, Nature is God's Art. Sir Philip Sidney explains:

There is no Arte delivered to mankinde that hath not the workes of Nature for his principall object, without which they could not consist, and on which they so depend, as they become Actors and Players, as it were, of what Nature will have set foorth.... The Poet ... goeth hand in hand with Nature.

Well over half a century later, Sir Thomas Browne concurred:

Now Nature is not at variance with Art, nor Art with Nature they being both servants of his Providence.... In brief all things are artificial; for Nature is the Art of God.

Instructing Perdita on the grafting of flowers her disguised father-in-law recognises this ultimate equivalence of Art and Nature nature is made better by no mean

But nature makes that mean; so over that art,
Which you say adds to nature, is an art
That nature makes ...
The art itself is nature.

(The Winter's Tale, IV. iv. 90 - 97)

The patterns which the Renaissance projected onto its environment were easily attributable to the workings of God. In this way, as Foucault says, the universe was folded in on itself and every natural object was imbued with the presence of its creator.

Turning to his comrades in exile, Duke Senior remarks upon this latent divinity, 'our life, exempt from public haunt, / Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, / Sermons in stones, and good in everything' (As You Like It, II. i. 15 - 17).

Under the apparent confusion of Nature, masked by the babbling brooks, the trees and stones, is a unifying harmony, a divine benevolence. The idea of discordia concors, 'the concealed god' (as Edgar Wind puts it), was dear to Neoplatonic theory and the ability to decode the riddle of the universe was often conceptualised as a cryptic literacy. 17 Thomas Beard's The Theatre of Gods judgements draws on this bibliographic metaphor as it discusses the miracle of creation: 'if we turne ouer euery leafe of Gods creatures from the tenth sphere to the centre of the earth, we shall find, that euery leafe and letter of this great volume, is admirable and wonderfull'. 18 In Antony and Cleopatra, when Charmian asks the soothsayer to produce his credentials he tells her: 'In nature's infinite book of secrecy / A little I can read' (I. ii. 8 - 9) and this is the significance of 'Natures mystick Book' in Marvell's Upon Appleton House (l. 584).

Nature is, if observed properly, an introductory manual to the ways of God, a source of information on the divine gardener. Michael comforts Adam by assuring him of the immediacy of God in the landscape:

```
doubt not but in Vallie and in plain
God is as here [Eden], and will be found alike
Present, and of his presence many a sign
Still following thee, still compassing thee round
With goodness and paternal love, his face
Express, and of his steps the track divine.
```

Paradise Lost, XI. 349 - 354

The point of reference for all of this internal reflection was man. Vitruvian man stands at the centre of geometry, the abstract of God's mysterious book. The ever-adroit speaker of Donne's 'The Extasie' justifies his seduction by arguing that intercourse can provide an epiphany of divine love. He draws again on the idea of literacy, 'Love's mysteries in souls do grow, / But yet the body is his book' (ll. 71 - 2). The universe is assembled around the body and takes its meaning from it. Analogical meaning finds its fulcrum in man. Our heads are spherical because the universe is spherical, our two eyes are the sun and the moon. When Caesar or Duncan is slaughtered the world convulses, when Lycidas dies Nature mourns, and when Eve bites into the apple,

\begin{quote}
Earth felt the wound, and Nature from her seat
Sighing through all her works gave signs of woe
That all was lost.
\end{quote}

(IX. 782 - 784)

According to Nicholas Culpeper's Directory for Midwives, 'There must needs be Microcosmical Stars in the Body of Man, because he is an exact Epitome of the Creation.' Richard Hooker proposes that man is 'not only the noblest creature in all the world, but even a very world in himself'. Thomas Browne is characteristically even more emphatic: 'There is no man alone, because every man is a microcosm and carries the whole world about him' while Phillip Stubbes employs the same mystical terminology: man 'is a wonderful Creature: and therefore is called in greek MICROCOSMOS, a little world in himself. And truly he is no lesse, whether we consider his spirituall soule, or his humaine body.' 23

In order to recognise these hidden empathies, these analogical resemblances in nature, to understand the influence over us of our guiding planets, we look around us for divine signatures. In Edward Phillips's dictionary, signature is defined in this technical sense, 'a signing, marking, or sealing; also the resemblance of any Plant or Mineral unto a mans body, or any parts thereof'. 24 Maximus of Ephesus (1480 - 1556) finds these signatures in the contiguous worlds of Nature and Art:

God himself the father and fashioner of all that is older than the sun of the sky, greater than time and eternity and all the flow of being, is unnameable by any lawgiver, unutterable by any voice, not to be seen by any eye. But we, being unable to apprehend his essence, use the help of sounds and names and pictures, of beaten gold and ivory and silver, of plants and rivers, mountain peaks and torrents, yearning for the knowledge of him, and in our weakness naming all that is beautiful in this world after his nature. 25

Both artistic (gold and ivory) and natural phenomena (plants and rivers) will enable man to place himself; he is, after all, God's finest artistic piece.

Jonathan Sawday has written about a number of Renaissance anatomical illustrations. He notes that dissected figures are often 'depicted within the peaceful frame of a pastoral landscape' and suggests that this is an attempt to placate opposition by emphasising the 'naturalness of dissection.' According to this analysis the placing of bodies within a natural landscape is a device designed to defuse objections to the practice of dissection: 'the body which is re-placed within the natural world is being returned, as it were, to the place from which it had originally come.' The effectiveness of such a device is debatable, particularly since one of the major objections to dissection was the belief in a corporal resurrection and whether the dissected body was pictured in a lecture theatre or a country scene would matter little when it came to rise again. Rather, I would suggest, the studies illustrate the continuity between man and the natural world which is a feature of Renaissance science and art.

The paintings of Giuseppe Arcimboldo are precisely about this analogical relationship between man and his environment. Their crazy fabric is exactly paralleled by John Donne's ability to find a pair of lovers in a geometrical instrument. What Dr Johnson didn't understand in his famous definition of the metaphysical conceit ('the yoking of heterogeneous images by violence together') is that Donne's images were not 'heterogeneous' to Donne. The poet's ingenuity, however, also indicates the immense effort required to perceive divinity in the everyday. The strain of Donne's poetry and Arcimboldo's pictures which angles them towards the absurd is symptomatic of the withdrawal of what the critic Robert Ornstein calls the 'medieval sea of faith'. Since Babel the perception of divine signatures has become problematic. Lorenzo understands the tragic inability of fallen man to hear the music of the spheres:

26 Jonathan Sawday, 'The Fate of Manyas: Dissecting the Renaissance Body', in Renaissance Bodies: The Human Figure in English Culture, c.1540 - 1600, edited by Lucy Gent and Nigel Llewellyn (London, 1990), 111 - 135, pp. 111, 128.
27 Ibid., p. 127.
28 See the generously illustrated The Arcimboldo Effect, introduced by Feliciano Benvenuti (Venice and London, 1987).
Here will we sit and let the sounds of music
Creep in our ears; soft stillness and the night
Become the touches of sweet harmony....
Look how the floor of Heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold;
There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-ey'd cherubines;
Such harmony is in immortal souls,
But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it.

(The Merchant of Venice, V. i. 55 - 65)

Man is the cypher of the cosmology and his ability to know his universe is dependent upon his ability to know himself: self-definition means universal definition. But since the fall, this is no easy thing, as Lorenzo so poignantly reminds us; whilst knowing he is at the centre of things, man cannot apprehend, except indirectly, the otherness which defines him. Thus the relativity which underlies a play like Antony and Cleopatra dramatises the moment of separation of man and the natural world. One particularly significant break with the secured analogical perspectives of the period can be seen in the land/sea images which the play associates with the two lovers.

II

Both God and (since he is fashioned in God's image) man appear in the landscape. Daniele Barbero's Practica della Perspettiva places fragmented human features firmly within a natural topos:

The better to hide what he paints, in accordance with the practices indicated, the painter who is proposing to delineate the two heads or other portrayals must know how to shade and cover the image so that instead of two heads, it shows landscapes, water, hills, rocks, and other things.... And then one would no longer recognize that the painting represents a head, but the nose would seem one thing and the forehead another, and, for example, the painter can make the nose look like a rock and the forehead a clod of earth if he wishes.

---

29 John Carey senses the mannerist satisfaction in Donne's forcing us to concede likeness in unlikeness 'Donne like joining things but he also liked the joint to show.' But at the same time, Carey's atomization is in danger of missing the continuity of Donne's anthropocentric world. (John Donne: Life, Mind and Art (London, 1981), p. 261.)

This idea of human landscapes was not only important in the visual arts. Salomon de Caus, the writer on perspective and landscape gardener who worked for a number of European royal patrons including Henry, Prince of Wales (for whom he designed Richmond Gardens and the grounds of Greenwich Palace), frequently punctuated his gardens with anthropomorphic vegetation.

Women especially were prone to being landscaped. In his De generatione animalium, Aristotle distinguishes between the sexes thus:

\[
\text{the male possess[es] the principle of movement and of generation, the female ... possess[es] that of matter.... This is why in cosmology ... they speak of the nature of the Earth as something female and call it 'mother'.}
\]

(I, ii)

In his The Renaissance Notion of Woman, Ian McLean notes that

\[
\text{the metaphorical association of woman with mother earth, nutrition, fruitfulness and the fluctuations of the moon, [was] deeply embedded in the substratum of ancient medieval thought, and sometimes explicit there. The implications of these metaphors - passivity, receptiveness, compassion, mutability - may account in part for the Renaissance view of female psychology.} \]

---

Milton draws upon and develops this Aristotelian idea in his version of creation. In Book VII of Paradise Lost, the landscape gives birth on a cosmic scale in response to divine insemination: 'The Earth obeyed, and straight / Opening her fertile womb teemed at a birth / Innumerable living creatures' (ll. 453 - 455). The commonplace Renaissance rhyme 'wombe / tomb' demonstrates that the earth is a final resting place as well as a source of life. As Phillip Stubbes puts it, 'Dame Nature, bryngeth us all into the world, after one sorte, and receiveth all againe, into the wombe of our mother, I meane, the bowelles of the earth.'

Timon addresses the earth in accordance with this mythical geogendering:

Common mother, thou,
Whose womb unmeasurable and infinite breast
Teems and feeds all ...
Yield him, who all thy human sons doth hate,
From forth thy plenteous bosom, one poor root!
Ensear thy fertile and conception's womb,
Let it no more bring out ingrateful man!

(IV. iii. 176 - 187)

Infused as it is with Timon's savage misanthropy, the speech, straddling the dichotomy between nature and nurture, reveals its trust in the positive qualitites of the earth-mother. The instant recognition of this topos is testament to its ubiquity. Females are 33 See for example, Richard Barnfield's Cassandra: 'Happy are they that die in infancy: / Whose sins are cancell'd in their mothers wombe: / Whose cradle is their graue, whose lap their tomb.' (Richard Barnfield, Poemes 1594 - 1598, edited by Edward Arber (Birmingham, 1883), p. 79.) Also Milton's 'Epitaph on the Marchioness of Winchester', ll. 31 - 34. Though he does not employ the rhyme, Romeo apostrophises Juliet's tomb as 'Thou detestable maw, thou womb of death' (V. iii. 45). See also G. A. E. Parfitt, 'Renaissance Wombs, Renaissance Tombs', Renaissance and Modern Studies, 15 (1971), 23 - 33.

---

34 Stubbes, The Anatomie of Abuses Brieve.

35 The Celtic Danu, the Scandinavian Nerthus, the Aztec Chicomecoatl, the Egyptian Renenet and Isis (with whom Cleopatra is explicitly identified in the play), the Roman Maia, Vesta and Ceres, the Greek Gaea, Rhea, Demeter, and Cybele, the Amerindian Coatlicue are all versions of Earth goddesses. In each case their femaleness functions as a point of convergence for ideas of fertility, plenitude and growth. (New Larousse Encyclopedia of Mythology, introduced by R. Graves (London and New York, 1968).)*
landmasses receptive (in the Renaissance scheme of things) to the insertion of the male seed. According to Plato, the sexual organs had a life of their own: 'in men', he tells us, 'the nature of the genital organs is disobedient and self-willed, like a creature that is deaf to reason'. They will, he goes on, 'sow [animalcules] upon the womb, as upon ploughed soil'. In Shakespeare's Pericles, the pimp insists to his servant that Marina be deflowered in a similarly agricultural manner: 'if she were a thornier piece of ground than she is, she shall be ploughed' (IV. vi. 144). Agrippa jokes with Enobarbus about the way in which Cleopatra turns swords into ploughshares: 'She made great Caesar lay his sword to bed. / He ploughed her, and she cropp'd' (II. ii. 231 - 232). In an exceptional departure from his usual loutish style, Lucio, in Measure for Measure, describes Claudio's sexual transgression to Isabella again in terms of sexual ploughing:

Your brother and his lover have embrac'd.
As those that feed grow full, as blossoming time
That from the seedness the bare fallow brings
To teeming foison, even so her plenteous womb
Expresseth his full tilth and husbandry.

(I. iv. 40 - 44)

The final word of this speech incarcerates in a single term both agricultural and sexual labour. Husbandry appropriates for exploitation both land and women. In a feudalistic society, the importance of farming and the ownership of land were crucial to economic well-being. Phillip Stubbes notes that Neither king, prince, earle, duke, lord, knight, esquire high or low, rich nor poore, nor yet any potentate, power or principalitie vpon the earth (how great a monarch soeuer) could liue or continue without the use of husbandrie and husbandmen. 38

Power depended on the possession of land, and land could be amassed by expedient marriage. The irony of Claudio's situation in Measure for Measure is precisely that although he has cultivated this particular land mass, he doesn't yet fully own her. His farming is essentially illicit because he is trespassing on the territory of another man.
The bride remains the property of the father until she is 'given away'. 39 Capulet stakes his paternal claim when he tells Paris that Juliet 'is the hopeful lady of my earth' (I. ii.
15). Mordecai Moxon's The Character, Praise and Commendation of a Chaste and Virtuous Woman illustrates this analogy between trespass and sexual licence. Adultery is described as very henious in respect of our Neighbour, whose hedge we break down, and whose enclosure we lay wast; whilst we do not only purloyn and defile and dishonour that which is his most proper possession ... but we invade and incroach upon his Inheritance also by making our Bastard his Heir. 40

Benedetto Varchi's The Blazon of Jealousie, translated by R. Toste and published in London in 1615, stresses the importance of keeping off another man's grass:

when this our high-pric'd Commoditie chanceth to light into some other merchants hands, and that our private Inclosure proveth to be a Common for others, we care no more for it. 41

38 Stubbes, The Second part of the Anatomic of Abuses (London, 1583), G6v.
40 London, 1708, p. 4. Cited by Patricia Parker, Literary Fat Ladies: Rhetoric, Gender, Property (London and New York, 41 Cited by Peter Stallybrass, 'Patriarchal Territories: The Body Enclosed', in Rewriting the Renaissance: The Discourses of Sexual Difference in Early Modern Europe, edited by Margaret Ferguson et al. (Chicago and London, 1986), 123 - 142, p. 128.
When Ford, disguised as Master Brooke, tells Falstaff of his unrequited love for Mistress Ford, he uses the same metaphor. His love, he says, is 'Like a fair house built on another man's ground' (Merry Wives, II. ii. 195). Petruchio exploits the agricultural possibilities of the metaphor when he brutally describes his wife as his farm from which he warns off potential intruders:

She is my goods, my chattels, she is my house,
My household stuff, my field, my barn,
My horse, my ox, my ass, my any thing,
And here she stands; touch her whoever dare
(The Taming of the Shrew, III. ii. 226 - 229)

The farm of the female body is often a site of invasion and struggle over possession and domain. The psychotic Ferdinand would rather lay waste, as a storm, to the landscape of his own sister than have her cultivated by somebody else:

Would I could be one, [a storm]
That I might toss her palace 'bout her ears,
Root up her goodly forests, blast her meads,
And lay her general territory as waste,
As she hath done her honour's
(The Duchess of Malfi, II. v. 17 - 21)

Similarly, in Tis Pity She's a Whore, the site of agricultural conflict is the body of the ill-fated sister who, while she provides food for Giovanni in the first place ('I digged for food'), is eventually destroyed by her owner-occupier to prevent her colonisation:

'Tis Annabella's heart, 'tis; why d'ee startle?
I vow 'tis hers: this daggers point ploughed up
Her fruitful womb, and left to me the fame
Of a most glorious executioner.
(V. vi. 24 - 33)
These horrific examples of fraternal violence rely on the analogy between the sister's physicality and the possession of land. The traditional exegesis of the Song of Songs as the seduction of the Church by her rightful husband, Christ, helped normalise this correlation between the female body and the landscape. Moreover the Canticles dwell, in a way uncannily appropriate to Tis Pity, on the incestuous possibility of the beloved being at once wife and sister: 'Thou has ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse'.

In Shakespeare's erotic poem, Venus and Adonis, Venus offers us a secular example of this sexualised land mass. As she seduces Adonis, she transforms herself into a garden of earthly delight:

>'Fondling,' she saith, 'since I have hemm'd thee here
Within the circuit of this ivory pale,
I'll be a park, and thou shalt be my deer:
Feed where thou wilt on mountain or in dale
Graze on my lips, and if those hills be dry,
Stray lower, where the pleasant fountains lie

>'Within this limit is relief enough
Sweet bottom grass and high delightful plane
Round rising hillocks, breaks obscure and rough,
To shelter thee from tempest and from rain:
Then be thou my deer, since I am such a park,
No dog shall rouse thee, though a thousand bark'

(11.229 - 240)

The entry of Adonis into the symbolic order requires his separation from the mother's body. The nurturance and protection that Venus offers here, is in stark contrast to the hostile briers and thorns that tear her legs later in the poem. The movement of Adonis to the hunt, his rejection of this eroticised maternalism, dramatises his fear of female sexual expectation from a point of view of male impotence. Ironically when the boar sheaths his tusk in the youth's 'soft groin' (l. 1116), out flows 'milk and blood ... mingled both together' (l. 902). The castration of Adonis takes place amid a bizarre instance of bestiality. His seed is spilt onto the barren ground of the forest rather than being usefully sown into the fecund garden which Venus offers him. In his headnote to the poem, Shakespeare deploys the symbol of farming for poetic composition itself:

---

if the first heire of my invention prove deformed, I shall be sorie it had so noble a god-father: and never after eare [ie, plough] so barren a land, for feare it yeeld me still so bad a harvest[.]

Shakespeare drew upon the tradition of the female landmass in his dramatic writing as well. In Two Gentlemen of Verona for example, the infatuated Valentine describes his love as a 'principality' (II. iv. 148) and in reply to Proteus's imperative to 'let her alone', he replies, 'Not for the world! Why, man, she is mine own' (l. 164). Underpinning this juvenile, petrarchan hyperbole is the same equivalence of woman and land to be conquered and exploited. The female is reified into a commodity.

John Donne's writing is, in this respect, more extreme. The poet of his 'Elegy: To his Mistress Going to Bed', describes frenetic copulation in terms of this discourse of land use and colonisation: 'Oh my America, my new found land, / My kingdom, safeliest when with one man manned, / My mine of precious stones, my empery, / How blessed am I in this discovering thee' (ll. 27 - 30). Discovery is of course the process of exploring and mapping for the first time the hitherto uncharted landscape of the female body, but the word encapsulates more literally the exposure of that body. Donne's lover is also dis-covering her in the sense of pulling back the duvet! When Ralegh founded his new American colony, he gave it as it were, in answer to Donne's poem, the fittingly exploitative name: Virginia. Moreover his description of Guiana in 1595 drew upon the same analogy: 'a country that hath yet her maydenhead'. While the comparison between territory and the female body is demeaning, in these examples, the topos could be utilised in what was, for Renaissance writers, a positive and complimentary way. In 'An Anatomy of the World', Donne redeployes the exploration motif in a serious, if not solemn manner. Of the death of Elizabeth Drury, he writes:

---

43 This bizarre cocktail may allude to the confluent mixture of blood and water that flowed from the side of the punctured Christ.

she whose rich eyes, and breast,
Gilt the West Indies, and perfumed the East;
Whose having breathed in this world, did bestow
Spice on those Isles, and bade them still smell so,
And that rich Indy which doth gold inter,
Is but as single money, coined from her:
She to whom this world must itself refer,
As suburbs, or the microcosm of her,
She, she is dead; she's dead.

(ll. 229 - 237)

By and large though, the literature that connects the virginal woman and the unexplored landmass lacks the respect of 'The First Anniversary'. Renaissance geo-eroticism dramatises the facelessness of male desire. These landscaped women are generally supine, still, and anonymous from the neck up. In a poem called 'A Rapture' which drew upon its author Thomas Carew a reproof in Parliament for its lewdness, the female body is again itemised, dissected, fragmented as it melts mysteriously into a fervently eroticised landscape:

I'll seize the rose-buds in their perfumed bed,
The violet knots, the curious mazes spread
O'er all the garden, taste the ripened cherry,

Cited by Parker, Literary Fat Ladies, p. 140.
Like Donne's intrepid explorer, Carew's persona is also a cartographer leaving his trail for others to follow as they certainly will, for in this poem and in the female landscape of the Renaissance, woman is sexually available for anyone. The poet of 'A Rapture' despises those 'greedy men that seek t'enclose the common / And within private arms impale free woman' (ll. 19 - 20); she is not free herself, rather she is freely available to everyone else, just like Jonson's Doll Common who speaks of herself as a commonwealth, 'Have yet some care of me, o'your republic' (The Alchemist, I.i. 110). In Wye Saltonstall's poem 'A Mayde', the girl is enclosed to prevent her becoming a common and crowned to prevent her becoming a commonwealth: 'Maids should not let their loves too common grow.' Woman comes to be an object for man's libidinal pleasure rather than a presence in her own right in these pastoral landscapes. It is trenchantly significant that the Latin verb rapere, 'to take by force', gives us both rapture and rape. Shakespeare takes up this vocabulary of geosexual assault. Titus addresses the raped Lavinia as 'Thou map of woe' (III. ii. 12) while the sleeping Lucrece is described, immediately prior to her rape, as a 'map of death' (l. 402). Her breasts are 'like ivory globes circled with blue, / A pair of maiden worlds unconquered' (ll. 407 - 408).

45 On the voyeuristic male conspiracy of the blazon, see Parkes, Literary Fat Ladies, pp. 128, 129, 153. Nancy J. Vickers makes the following telling remark, 'bodies fetishized by a poetic voice logically do not have a voice of their own' (Diana Described: Scattered Woman and Scattered Rhyme, Critical Inquiry, 8 (1981 - 82), 265 - 279, p. 277).

46 Cited by Stallybrass, 'Patriarchal Territories', p. 129.
Though tonally entirely different, Dromio's description of the serving woman in The Comedy of Errors utilises the same misogynistic mapping of the female body. He tells Antipholus that she is so fat, 'she is spherical like a globe; I could find out countries in her' (III. ii. 113). In a Renaissance example of rugby club humour her hot breath is Spain, the barren hardness of her hand is Scotland, the Indies are represented by the jewels or spots on her nose and the Netherlands provide their own rather obvious and smutty joke. Columbus himself believed 'that his newly discovered hemisphere was shaped like a woman's breast and that the earthly paradise was located at the highpoint corresponding to the nipple'.

Landscapes are female not merely physiographically but, as a number of the above examples intimate, economically and politically too. In Shakespeare's histories the concept of the motherland feeds directly into notions of nationalism. John of Gaunt's valedictory images England as 'this teeming womb of royal kings, / Fear'd by their breed, and famous by their birth' (II. i. 51 - 52) and Richard himself conceptualises rebellion as an act of maternal rape (I. iii. 125 - 138). In Henry V the French King describes the hitherto peaceful cities in terms of anthropomorphic landscapes. Their intact city walls, make them politically virginal: 'you see them [the French cities] perspectively, the cities turned into a maid; for they are all girdled with maiden walls that war hath never ent'red' (V. ii. 315). The agrarian phenomenon of enclosure of which Carew's speaker is so contemptuous, had long applied equally to women as to land. In The Merchant's Tale, January keeps the key to his young wife's garden, and her lover can only gain entrance to this zone of sexual indulgence after she has copied the key for him. She is his 'paradis terrestre' (l. 120). The faithful woman ever since the Song of Songs, and the Romance of the Rose had been imaged as a hortus conclusus. Campion employs this analogy, relying on the stock colours red and white associated with female beauty:

---

There is a garden in her face,
Where Roses and white Lillies grow;
A heav'ly paradice is that place,
Wherein all pleasant fruits doe flow.
There Cherries grow which none may buy,
Till Cherry ripe themselves doe cry.

(Fourth Booke of Ayres, vii. 1 - 6)

Herrick's poetry is abundant in such female gardens, excelling as he does in the carpe florem tradition:

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old time is still a flying;
And this same flower that smiles today
Tomorrow will be dying

('To the Virgins, To Make Much of Time', 1 - 4)

Against the blithe indulgence of this tradition, Marvell's masculine solipsism is constructed as a direct parody. The cavalier luxuriating in his misogynistic 'Garden' is prepared to satisfy his onanistic energies on anything at hand - especially soft fruit:

What wond'rous Life in this I lead!
Ripe Apples drop about my head;
The Luscious Clusters of the Vine
Upon my Mouth do crush their Wine;
The Nectaren, and curious Peach
Into my hands themselves do reach;
Stumbling on Melons, as I pass,
Insnar'd with Flow'rs, I fall on Grass.

(ll. 33 - 40)

In this exquisite plethora of Nature's sexualised bounty, the speaker seems to have overlooked the dark implications of the apples of that archetypal garden - Eden. This garden with its rich temptation is actually dangerous, it causes the unwary to stumble, its flowers can ensnare and the final falling echoes the fatal fall and expulsion from the most superb garden of all. The final stanza of 'The Garden' with its industrious bee and its floral sundial bludgeoningly asserts the futility of the pastoral dream. Work and time are both results of man's first disobedience and the delights of the pastoral fantasy and sexual indulgence have cost us our immortality. As Marvell puts it in Upon Appleton House: 'What luckess Apple did we tast, / To make us Mortal and The Wast?' (ll. 327 - 328).

In the visual arts, the hortus conclusus finds its high point in the fifteenth century in the paintings of Martin Schongauer, Stefan Lochner, and Stefano da Verona with their pictures of the Madonna in the rose garden. This Marian image is appropriated by the propaganda of the Virgin Queen herself and given a clearly nationalistic tone. The Ditchley Portrait of 1592 has Elizabeth firmly established in her own territory. Her cool gaze should be enough to warn intruders off. The meniscus which falls away from the precious stone set in the silver sea indicates that Elizabeth is not simply standing on England, but on the very globe itself. England's naval domination, testified by the defeat of the Armada only four years earlier, and its burgeoning interest in geographical exploration by sea are definitively inscribed in the painting. In The Armada Portrait, which illustrates the triumphant English fleet routing the Armada, the Queen sits contemplating her power in front of her crown. Her hand rests significantly on a globe and the New World is quite literally under her thumb. In The Rainbow Portrait, the Queen is seen controlling not only the geographical areas of the earth's surface, but also the climate that they suffer! In these pictures, England most certainly does rule the waves that surround it. Ten years after the Armada, Queen Elizabeth is quite literally mapped onto the European scene. The Dutch engraving reproduced in plate B is a superb example of the politics of female cartography. Elizabeth is imaged as Europa; Italy forms her right arm while her left is made up of England and Scotland. Maps, like those in Tamburlaine, The Jew of Malta, I Henry IV, and King Lear, are of course symbols of power. They establish zones of possession and government; at first only Caliban knows the way around the island and Lear's political authority is rent along with his map. Elizabeth's mappings are profoundly ideological reworkings of the tradition of female landscape. The paradox of the monarch was her self-image as that of a man trapped inside a woman's body. Addressing her navy she divided herself between the sexes: 'I know I have the bodie but of a weak and feeble woman, but I have the heart and stomach of a King.' The male part of Elizabeth governs not only her female part, but the land of which the female part is map and monarch.

If woman was especially imminent in dry land, man was associated more often with the water. Cellini's salt-cellar, for example (see plates C and D), relies in its sexual allocation on this pattern:

I represented the sea and the land with their legs intertwined just as some branches of the sea run into the land and the land juts into the sea... I placed a trident in the right hand of the sea and in his left hand, to hold the salt, I had put a delicately worked ship.... The land I had represented as a very delicate woman ... [on] the left, I had made

---

49 Given the tendency of this topos to legitimate a patriarchal agrarian economy and to exculpate the sexual exploitation of woman, it is peculiar to find its adoption by feminism. Rachel Blau DuPlessis writes that 'Woman as mother translates into ... woman/nature' (Washing Blood', Feminist Studies, 4 (1978), 1 - 12, p. 9), while Hélène Cixous believes that the writing woman enjoys a security and intimacy with a mythical Good Mother. In a moment of mystical topography she employs the imagery of the female landscape: 'I am myself the earth, everything that happens on it, all the lives that live me in my different forms.' (Cited by Toril Moi, Sexual/Textual Politics (London and New York, 1985), p. 116). Catherine Belsey notes wryly that being an adolescent in the fifties was in part 'to have experienced fantasies of myself as an earth-mother, working at a trestle table to produce apple pies that would gratify hordes of rosy-cheeked and smiling children!' (Afterword to The Matter of Difference: Materialist Feminist Criticism of Shakespeare, edited by Valerie Wayne (Hemel Hempstead, 1991), 257 - 270, p. 259.) The topos of the 'earth-mother' is surprisingly abundant in modern literature. In Browning's 'Two in the Campagna', intercourse is cosmographed thus 'earth lies bare to heaven above' (l. 33). Other examples would include Tennyson's Maud, Heaney's 'Act of Union', and most recently Alan Bennett's The Madness of George III (London, 1992), p. 58.
a very delicately worked Ionic temple that I had intended for the pepper. 50

Mother Nature or Mother Earth were assumed female; water whether sea (deified as Neptune) or rain (deified as Jove) seems more likely to be represented in male terms. Spenser offers a clear example of this imaging of male potency in terms of rain. As the Redcross Knight and Una pass through the forest, it begins to rain:

Thus as they past,
The day with cloudes was suddeine ouercast,
And angry love an hideous storme of raine
Did poure into his Lemans lap so fast,
That euery wight to shrowd it did constrain,
And this farie couple eke to shroud themselues were fain.

(I. i. 6) 51

In Titian's Danae the goddess lays supine, her legs open to receive the monetary sperm. In Botticelli's Birth of Venus, the goddess surfs in to the shore on a sea of divine semen. Pico writes 'Venus could not have been born if the testicles of Uranus did not fall into the waters of the sea.' 52 Donne's 'Anatomy of the World' laments that, following the death of Elizabeth Drury, the sky and earth are no longer able to procreate:

Nor in aught more this world's decay appears,
Than that her influence the heaven forbears,
Or that the elements do not feel this,
The father or the mother barren is.
The clouds conceive not rain, or do not pour
In the due birth time, down the balmy shower.
Th'air doth not motherly sit on the earth,
To hatch her seasons, and give all things birth.

(ll. 377 - 384)

---

52 Cited by Wind, Pagan Mysteries, p. 133.
The insemination of the female land by male water and seminal froth reappear in a more fecund way in Hero and Leander. Fresh from copulating with his love, Leander arrives at the beach to be greeted by his sister Hermione. As he shakes the water from his body, the earth responds by conceiving and giving birth to flowers:

His most kind sister all his secrets knew,
And to her singing like a shower he flew,
Sprinkling the earth, that to their tombs took in Streams dead for love to leave his ivory skin
Which yet a snowy foam did leave above,
As soul to the dead water that did love;
And from thence did the first white roses spring
(For love is sweet and fair in every thing)
And all the sweetened shore as he did go,
Was crowned with od'rous roses white as snow.

(III. 73 - 82)

In Twelfth Night, Orsino distinguishes between what he considers to be the paucity of female love and the passion that beats in his own male breast by invoking the elemental grandeur of the sea: 'Alas, their [women's] love may be call'd appetite - / No motion of the liver ... / But mine is all as hungry as the sea, / And can digest as much' (II. iv. 96 - 100). His love, in accordance with the iconographical norm, has an infinite capacity which 'Receiveth as the sea' (I. i. 11).

In an excellent essay entitled "'The Swallowing Womb": Consumed and Consuming Women in Titus Andronicus, Marion Wynne-Davies demonstrates how gendered geography is distorted and confused by the pressure of tragedy. 53 She cites Titus's speech from III. i:

If there were reason for these miseries,
Then into limits could I bind my woes.

When heaven doth weep, doth not the earth o'erflow?
If the winds rage, doth not the sea wax mad,
Threat'ning the welkin with his big-swoll'n face?
And wilt thou have a reason for this coil?
I am the sea; hark how her sighs do blow.
She is the weeping welkin, I the earth;
Then must my sea be moved with her sighs;
Then must my earth with her continual tears
Become a deluge, overflowed and drowned;
For why my bowels cannot hide her woes,
But like a drunkard I must vomit them.

(Il. 220 - 232)

In this speech, Titus roundly acknowledges the maritime vigour of masculinity - 'I am the sea' - but his realisation that he has just pointlessly sacrificed his hand and the appalling condition of his daughter, persuade him that he has lost his autonomy. Consequently, he images himself as the passive earth subject to the deluge of his daughter's tears. Wynne-Davies writes:

> When our pity and sympathy become overwhelming this figurehead of patriarchy ... turns to his mutilated daughter and denies difference, elemental and gender.... as the speech moves towards its end, a fatalistic sense of total breakdown becomes apparent.... we are faced with the appalling consequences of tragedy, which perforce takes identity beyond its limit to a point where gender overflows itself into another. 54

I would like to propose that a similar dissolution of 'all delineations of difference' 55 takes place with respect to the central protagonists of Antony and Cleopatra.

54 Ibid., p. 144.
55 Ibid., p. 143.
In her study of Broken Nuptials in Shakespeare's Plays, Carol Thomas Neely notes a recent propensity to wrest literary meaning from any single monolithic conceptualisation and a corresponding tendency to see it in terms of dynamic relationships between male and female. For example, writing of Antony and Cleopatra she says, 'Recently, psychoanalytic and feminist critics have likewise found in the play the dissolution of gender boundaries.' She goes on to illustrate the ways in which gender oppositions are left behind, but in doing so relies upon the hoary notion that the love of the protagonists is transcendental and mystical. The lovers are mythologised in her account and, in their death, triumph over the world of Roman expediency. I believe that Neely is right that the gender boundaries are collapsed, but my evidence is directly based on the imagery of the play. There is no need to employ quasi-divine notions of an extra-terrestrial love, because the play explicitly muddles the sexual geography and the female/male categories that it stands for.

In refuting this iconographical norm Antony and Cleopatra takes the anxiety implicit in the mannerist analogues of Donne and Arcimboldo a stage further. Unlike the salt cellar, the land and sea do not merely intertwine, they actually merge; Antony and Cleopatra takes place against 'The varying shore o’th’world' (IV. xv. 11). In Shakespeare's play it is not the centre that cannot hold, but the extremities. Sexual taxonomies are eroded like the beach itself, and ultimately, in places, they become peculiarly reversed. In his On the General Nature of Beauty, Pico discusses the old belief that attributed this kind of sexual inversion to the need for cosmic harmony: 'according to the ancient astrologers ... Venus was placed in the centre of heaven next to Mars, because she must tame his impulse which is by nature destructive and corrupting. 57

---

In Botticelli's Mars and Venus, the male is passive, supine and naked - all qualities associated above with Titian's Danae. Venus on the other hand is erect, fully dressed and voyeuristic. When Venus appears in Shakespeare's poem she picks up the unwilling and virginal Adonis and takes him off to seduce him. The macrocosmic version of this poem, Antony and Cleopatra, is similarly interested in the woman as a figure of authority and potency. Along with this inversion is an appropriate reversal of the imagery of sexual geography. Cleopatra is constantly associated with water and even with Jove. Enobarbus insists that Cleopatra's volatile emotions are sincere:

> We cannot call her winds and waters sighs and tears; they are greater storms and tempests than almanacs can report. This cannot be cunning in her; if it be, she makes a show'r of rain as well as Jove.

(I. ii. 145)

Cleopatra later promises a messenger that she will 'set thee in a shower of gold' (II. v. 45) if he brings her good news, and the subsequent raining kisses reiterate this motif (III. xiii. 85).

Complementing this association of the female with virile symbolism is the emasculation of the play's male characters. Octavius is scathing of the blurring of sexual categories which takes place in Egypt: Antony 'is not more manlike / Than Cleopatra, nor the queen of Ptolemy / More womanly than he' (I. iv. 5 - 7). Antony's fellow Romans are similarly anxious about the compromise of their general's machismo. Philo describes Antony as

'the bellows and the fan / To cool a gipsy's lust' (I. i. 9 - 10) and the play immediately concretises this sentiment with the stage direction: 'Enter ANTONY, CLEOPATRA, her Ladies, ... with Eunuchs fanning her.' In Egypt, only the eunuchs wield fans.

In his youth Antony was conventionally identified with the mannishness of the sea; his old school master introduces himself to Caesar 'As is the morn-dew on the myrtle leaf / To his grand sea' (III. xii. 8 - 9). However, the play continually represents him as effeminised and accordingly he is associated with the Alps ('On the Alps / It is reported...' I. iv. 66). The sea is no longer Antony's element. This transsexual movement is sometimes concurrent with post-orgasmic exhaustion (as in Botticelli's picture); reminiscing, Cleopatra reminds us of this particular instance of sexual reversal:

O times!
I laugh'd him out of patience; and that night
I laugh'd him into patience, and next morn,
Ere the ninth hour, I drunk him to his bed,
Then put my tires and mantles on him, whilst
I wore his sword Philippan.

(II. v. 18 - 23)

Cleopatra, like her archetype Venus Amarta adopts the weapons for her own and usurps Mars/Antony's belligerence. Her appropriation of his sword signifies the transference of phallic power from male to female. Antony's later 'O, thy vile lady! / She has robb'd me of my sword' (IV. xiv. 22 - 23) bewails his recognition of impotence. Romeo too recognises the sexual compromise involved in handing over weapons to women: 'O sweet Juliet, / Thy beauty hath made me effeminate / And in my temper soften'd valour's steel' (III. i. 110 - 112). Burnished masculinity is rendered flaccid in a woman's hand. Antony

---

58 For a picture of Venus Amarta, see Pagan Mysteries, plate 73. Peter Stallybrass notes Venus Victrix as a 'fantasy of female rule, of rebellion at the heart of family and state alike.' (The World Turned Upside Down: Inversion, Gender and the State, in The Matter of Difference, 201 - 220, p. 216.)
is no longer, phallically or militarily 'the firm Roman' (I. v. 44). Antony's address to Cleopatra as 'Thetis' (III. vii. 60) is, in this sense, doubly ironic. First Thetis is a sea nymph and so rhetorically Antony has allocated the Queen to the male element, but moreover, Thetis is the mother of Achilles for whom she carries armour. In IV. iv Cleopatra insists on arming her lover and symbolically this scene indicates that Antony's manhood can be appropriated by a woman until the moment she deems it suitable to return it.

Mars represents the fusion of masculinity and martial virtuosity and the suggestion is that the collapse of either will result in the decay of the other. Antony's transvestism (like that of Hercules, Achilles and Samson) anticipates his defeat. But this desiccation of virility is by no means confined to the leading male; this castration and the military demise it initiates, are pervasive and percolate down from Antony to Enobarbus thence to Antony's forces. Resigning as his leader, Antony prompts the following bitter response from Enobarbus, 'Look, they weep; / And I, an ass, am onion-ey'd. For shame! / Transform us not to women' (IV. ii. 34 - 36).

These tears stand for the evaporation of the troops' virility and their consequent military prostration. This idea of emasculation is coupled with the traditional iconography of land and sea and the issue of the site of the imminent battle is thus imbued with a mythological significance.

Sold:
O noble Emperor, do not fight by sea;
Trust not to rotten planks. Do you misdoubt
This sword and these my wounds? Let th' Egyptians
And the Phoenicians go a-ducking; we Have us'd to conquer standing on the earth
And fighting foot to foot.

Anto:
Well, well - away.

Exeunt Antony, Cleopatra and Enobarbus
By Hercules, I think I am i'th' right.

_Cani:_ Soldier, thou art: but his whole action grows
Not in the power on't. So our leader's led,
And we are women's men.

(III. vii. 61 - 70)

Soldierly pragmatism is overruled by Cleopatra's maritime determination - clearly Antony and his army are governed by her. Moreover, she says that she wants to 'Appear there for a man' (III. vii. 18) - we are reminded of Elizabeth galvanising her navy with the suggestion that she has the heart and the stomach of a king.

In attempting to win a victory at sea, Antony is redefining his masculinity in terms of it; that is, that Caesar's challenge at sea demands a marine response:

_Anto:_ we
Will fight with him by sea.

_Cleo:_ By sea! What else?

_Cani:_ Why will my lord do so?

_Anto:_ For that he dares us to 't.

(III. vii. 27 - 29)

In Shakespeare's source, Plutarch has Antony fight at sea in deference to Cleopatra's wishes. Shakespeare, by drawing attention to the dare, makes Actium a battle-zone not merely of politics but of masculinity. As Jonathan Dollimore puts it, this is 'an obsessive attempt on the part of an ageing warrior ... to reassert his virility, not only to Cleopatra but also to Caesar, his principal male competitor.'

---

Marlowe's The Tragedy of Dido, Queen of Carthage offers an interesting parallel here. Aeneas receives advice from his general, Achates, who alerts him to the imminence of his own uxorious decline:

\[\text{Acha:} \quad \text{Banish that ticing dame from forth your mouth,} \\
\text{And follow your foreseeing stars in all;} \\
\text{This is no life for men-at-arms to live,} \\
\text{Where dalliance doth consume a soldier's strength,} \\
\text{And wanton motions of alluring eyes} \\
\text{Effeminate our minds inur'd to war.} \]

(IV. iii. 31 - 36)

Aeneas receives the advice instead of rejecting it and eight lines later he resolves to act upon it. In accordance with the 'proper' allocation of sexual geography, his break from this 'ticing dame' is marked by a return to the virile sea in quest of his mother-land: 'Trojans aboard, and I will follow you, ... To sea, Aeneas! Find out Italy' (ll. 45 - 56).

Like that of Antony and Cleopatra and The Tragedy of Dido, the sea of Sonnet 135 raises issues of virility.

\[\text{Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will,} \\
\text{And Will to boot, and Will in over-plus:} \\ \text{More than enough am I that vex thee still,} \\ \text{To thy sweet will making addition thus.} \\ \text{Wilt thou, whose will is large and spacious,} \\ \text{Not once vouchsafe to hide my will in thine?} \\
\text{Shall will in others seem right gracious,} \\
\text{And in my will no fair acceptance shine?} \\
\text{The sea, all water, yet receives rain still,} \\ \text{And in abundance addeth to his store;} \\
\text{So thou, being rich in Will, add to thy Will} \\ \text{One will of mine, to make thy large Will more.} \\
\text{Let no unkind, no fair beseechers kill;} \\ \text{Think all but one, and me in that one Will.} \]
The punning on Will (which as well as the poet's name stands for both female and male genitals) and the witty self-consciousness imbue the sonnet with sexual zest but despite its unflinching ribaldry and its sophisticated word-play, the sonnet, in just the same manner as Antony and Cleopatra, identifies the female principle with the sea (II. 9 - 11) thus inverting the norm that was employed by Cellini and Marlowe. In the play the sea challenges rather than embodies virile sexuality and questions Antony's masculine potency. Unlike Antony's, the sexuality in the poem can never overflow.

This mysterious affinity between moisture and eroticism underlies much of the Egyptian 'magic' forming an intriguing yet curiously inevitable dramatic sub-structure. Enobarbus mentions that 'When she first met Mark Antony, she purs'd up his heart, upon the river of Cydnus' (II. ii. 190) and Cleopatra reiterates this just before her suicide: 'I am again for Cydnus, / To meet Mark Antony' (V. ii. 227 - 228). The affair seems to be sanctioned by an aquatic puissance - it is of course entirely apt that Cleopatra 'purs'd up his heart' while on her golden barge, indeed the entire barge description portrays Cleopatra as a kind of siren - irresistible but inaccessible surrounded by water. 'In Rome, overflow is a human vice; in Egypt it is a natural necessity.' 60 Susan Snyder emphasises the relationship between the Queen and the river, 'Cleopatra's actions have the ebb and flow of water: laughing Antony out of patience and then laughing him back in (II. vii. 19 - 20), meeting his sadness with dancing and his mirth with sudden sickness (I. iii. 3 - 5).’ 61 Given Cleopatra's supernatural kinship with water and especially the Nile, her hysterical alternative to Roman denigration is vehemently ironic:

Rather a ditch in Egypt
Be gentle grave unto me! Rather on Nilus' mud

Lay me stark-nak'd, and let the water-flies
Blow me into abhorring!

(V. ii. 57 - 60)

Despite the horror and violence of such a death there is about it a peculiar aptness as well as an uncomfortable eroticism.

Elsewhere the Nile functions as a kind of sexual totem. The swelling Nile of Antony's speech emphasises its phallic significance as well as its importance as a fertility symbol.

The higher Nilus swells
The more it promises; as it ebbs, the seedsman
Upon the slime and ooze scatters his grain,
And shortly comes to harvest.

(II. vii. 20 - 23)

In Egyptian mythology, according to Plutarch, the flooding of the Nile symbolised the fertilization of the female earth (Isis) by male moisture (Osiris). This impregnation of the female land by a male water exactly matches the geosexual categories of the Renaissance in general. It is in Shakespeare's play, wherein the female ruler of Egypt is associated with its major river, that the pattern is reversed.

---

62 The Nile's prognostic properties seem to have been a commonplace. Francis Osborne's fatherly advice draws on its proverbial powers in the context of marital felicity: 'As the fertility of the ensuing year is guessed at by the height of the river Nile, so by the greatness of a wife's portion may much of the future conjugal happiness be calculated.' Advice to a Son: Precepts of Lord Burghley, Sir Walter Raleigh, and Francis Osborne, edited by Louis B. Wright (Ithaca, NY, 1962), p. 68. The fertility of Egypt was itself a popular myth. Culpeper notes that 'In Egypt many times women have five or six children at one birth; the reason is supposed to be the fruitfulness of the place, and if so (as is probable) then let women that would be fruitful, live in fruitful places.' (A Directory for Midwives, p. 104 (misnumbered as p. 140).)

63 Spenser alludes to its fertility specifically in masculine terms: 'As when old father Nilus gins to swell / With timely pride above the Aegyptian vale, / His fattie waues do fertile slime outwell, / And overflow each plaine and lowly dale ...' (The Faerie Queene, I. i. 21). See also Ovid, Metamorphoses, I. 416 - 437.

In addition to its erotic role the Nile has a more sorcerous consequence; its magnitude is indicative of Egypt's agricultural yield and thus it functions as a kind of inanimate seer or astrologer. The sinister destructive force of the Nile associated with Cleopatra's uncomfortable deathwish is here subsumed by a more bountiful attitude. The river's and hence Cleopatra's phallicism is reinforced by its and her association with snakes and serpents. She imagines Antony murmuring to himself (somewhat unflatteringly): 'Where's my serpent of old Nile?' (I. v. 25) and in an attempt to placate the messenger she has just threatened, she assures her servants that she will keep her fangs in: 'Melt Egypt into Nile! and kindly creatures / Turn all to serpents! Call the slave again, / Though I am mad, I will not bite him' (II. v. 78 - 80). As she kisses farewell to her waiting woman, before her suicide, Iras falls and dies. Cleopatra wonders if she has actually turned into a snake: 'Have I the aspic in my lips?' (V. ii. 291). Earlier Cleopatra alludes to the head of the Medusa - the female gorgon with snakey hair that Antony is said to resemble when looked at from an alternative angle. 65 If your news is bad, she tells the messenger, 'Thou shouldst come like a Fury crown'd with snakes, / Not like a formal man' (II. v. 40 - 41). In his essay Medusa's Head, Freud suggests that the head functions as a focus for both anxiety and security about phallic potency. On the one hand, the fact that the head is severed implies castration, but on the other the paralysis induced by the sight of the head, suggests erection, thus the head 'offers consolation to the spectator: he is still in possession of a penis, and the stiffening reassures him of the fact.' 66

Like that of Milton's Sin, Cleopatra's gender is problematised by the snake imagery that surrounds her. This phallic confusion is intimately related to the blurring of geosexual categories for as the play consistently reemphasises, the origin of the snake (like its fellow reptile the crocodile) is the pregenital slime of the Nile itself. Cleopatra asks the clown for 'the pretty worm of Nilus' (V. ii. 241) and the first soldier recognises the slime on the fig leaves as that which 'th'aspic leaves / Upon the caves of Nile' (V. ii. 349 - 350). With characteristic ambivalence, the sources of life and death are rooted in the same images. The asp is a child of the Nile, sucking its life from the breast of the Egyptian Queen and as she is drained the moisture which is her very life force ebbs from her.

---

65 See headnote to this chapter.

Just before his remorseful death Enobarbus invokes the moon:

O sovereign mistress of true melancholy,
The poisonous damp of night dispense upon me,
That life, a very rebel to my will,
May hang no longer on me.

(IV. ix. 12 - 15)

Moisture here is associated with a kind of natural cosmic virulence. Enobarbus's conscious faculties are submerged beneath a sea of 'poisonous damp'. In stark opposition to the fecundity associated with the swelling Nile, death and fluidity are linked here. Protesting her love for Antony, Cleopatra challenges nature to revenge her cold-heartedness:

From my cold heart let heaven engender hail,
And poison it in the source, and let the first stone
Drop in my neck: as it determines, so
Dissolve my life! The next Caesarion smite!
Till by degrees the memory of my womb,
Together with my brave Egyptians all,
By the discandying of all this pelleted storm,
Lie graveless, till the flies and gnats of Nile
Have buried them for prey.

(III. xiii. 159 - 167)
The speech is peculiar in its affirmation of love via images of dissolution and decay. The woman's fertile potentiality reified in the womb surrounded by melting and physical corruption, imbues the speech with passion and equivocation. The similarity of Antony's subsequent speech draws them together and their themes - love and political demise - become curiously synonymous:

The hearts
That spaniel'd me at heels, to whom I gave
Their wishes, do discandy, melt their sweets,
On blossoming Caesar.

(IV. xii. 20 - 23)

Dollimore notes that as Antony and Cleopatra 'trangress the power structure which constitutes them both their political and personal identities - inextricably bound together if not identical - disintegrate.' The synthesis of destruction and liquefaction is, usually in a moment of wrathful outburst, directed towards a whole nation: thus we have Cleopatra's curse 'Melt Egypt into Nile!' (II. v. 78) recalling Antony's former execration 'Let Rome in Tiber melt' (I. i. 33). The firm imperatives imply a destructive determination but their concision hints at an underlying unsophistication, a childlike damnation of whatever conflicts with their own aspirations. Elsewhere this civic destruction is even more violently articulated and even more selfish: 'Sink Rome, and let their tongues rot / That speak against us!' (III. vii. 14 - 15).

The sea's immutability and infinite capacity make it a common image of destructive potentiality in Shakespeare: 'I have seen the hungry ocean gain / Advantage on the kingdom of the shore' (Sonnet 64. 5 - 6). Antony's love for Cleopatra has something of this 'never-surfeited' appetite (The Tempest, III. iii. 55). Pompey refers to him as 'The ne'er-lust-wearied Antony' (II. i. 38) and the very opening lines of the play regard Antony's love as fulsome: 'Nay, but this dotage of our general's / O'erflows the measure' (I. i. 1 - 2). Antony is clearly unable to confine his passions within the modest limits of order and we wait with Philo for the terrible moment when the dam will break.

Dollimore, Radical Tragedy, p. 206.

Just as the collation of these instances of liquefaction signifying death and violent destruction with those in which it is an image of fecundity, indicate its ambivalence, the absence of moisture, as in the case of Cleopatra's death, does not necessarily imply vitality. Despite these evocations of maritime disaster, the annihilation of civilisation by water, and Antony's own passionate saturation, wetness is nonetheless a life-force. Enobarbus's heart 'being dried with grief, will break to powder' (IV. ix. 17) while in suitably elevated language, Cleopatra notes the equivalence between desiccation and death: 'Now no more / The juice of Egypt's grape shall moist this lip' (V. ii. 279 - 280).

IV

Antony and Cleopatra is a play haunted by the relativity of truth, a play that is characterised by its ability to hold 'contradictory modes of living and understanding in its wide embrace'. Its very opening words are a fragment of a larger argument: 'Nay, but ...' (I. i. 1). Repeatedly within the drama, characters have their most confident expectations and assessments of situations rebuffed. So Cleopatra is surprised by Antony's marriage to Octavia, Antony suspects Cleopatra of collusion with Caesar, and later believes that she is dead. Cleopatra, after the battle of Actium protests 'I little thought / You would have followed' (III. xi. 55-56). In addition, Enobarbus is astounded by Antony's generosity: having deserted him and hearing that his possessions have been forwarded, he muses 'This blows my heart. / If swift thought break it not' (IV. vi. 34-35) and despite Antony's expectation that the Romans will fight at sea (IV. x. 1) Caesar in fact decides to deploy his soldiers (IV. xi. 1).

---

Antony and Cleopatra probably contains more messengers than any other Shakespearean play and this is symptomatic of the indeterminacy of the 'truths' that they speak. Their messages are nearly always formulated to manipulate or direct subsequent action rather than to convey information neutrally. The go-between that denigrates Octavia also flatters Cleopatra, the messenger that brings the news of Fulvia's rebellion hints that Antony should really have taken her in hand and prevented it, and Mardian's bluff that the Queen has killed herself has been designed to wreak revenge in the form of remorse on Antony for his rejection of Cleopatra. The plethora of messengers seems designed to foreground the relativity of their messages. Rumour, when he appears in Shakespeare, is maliciously delighted in the erroneous possibilities of communication:

```
The posts come tiring on,
And not a man of them brings other news
Than they have learnt of me. From Rumour's tongues
They bring smooth comforts false, worse than true wrongs.
(II Henry IV, Induction. 37-40)
```

Truth is shown to be untamed in both action and words and finally fact is substituted with elusiveness. Indeed throughout Antony and Cleopatra, 'There is scarce truth enough alive to make societies secure' (Measure for Measure, III. ii. 215). This disparity between different kinds of actuality precipitates much of the action of the plot. The examples above are illustrative of some of the instances in which an apprehension of
'reality' (by which I mean things as they appear to each character) is not only shown to be fallacious, but to initiate a subsequent progression of the plot itself.

Just as this sort of lacuna constitutes the play's own narrative principle, so a similar breach drives the play in dramatic terms. This second discrepancy lies between the traditional grandeur and range of the ancient world and the theatrical production in front of us, and is not simply repeated throughout the play but is enacted by the whole of it. Prognosticating the dramatisation of her story, Cleopatra reflects,

the quick comedians
Extemporally will stage us, and present
Our Alexandrian revels; Antony
Shall be brought drunken forth, and I shall see
Some squeaking Cleopatra boy my greatness
I' th' posture of a whore.

(V. ii. 215-220)

The speech has a metatheatricality about it, bridging the gap between the legendary magnanimity of 'A pair so famous' (V. ii. 357) and their Elizabethan representation, in which boys took the role of women. Nowhere does the audience see the goddess on her barge, nowhere the mighty Mars-like Antony: instead all we have direct access to are the actions and rhetoric of a selfish tempestuous woman and an impotent man who cannot even fall properly on his own sword as they are played out by two actors on a restricted stage, against a flat backdrop. All we really see is an actor boying Cleopatra's greatness and a man playing a drunk in place of a demi-god. If a queen of fire and air or an emperor Antony do become accessible, they do so only contingently as an effort of the poetry's self-assertion or the actors' gifts.
Antony and Cleopatra is built upon infinitely regressive ironies: the stage, the cast, the characters, the characters' ideas and lastly the ideas themselves and we are shown that in the smallest of these Chinese boxes, where we would expect an absolute standard, we in fact find only a relativity which undermines our most fundamental conceptions about the interplay between female and male. The multivalency of Antony and Cleopatra is partly related to its status as a dramatic illusion, which is something that the play continually insists on, but it is also, as I have argued, the result of the play's appropriation and subversion of the traditional sexual geography of the Renaissance.
Part Two: Dramaturgy and Language
Dreaming Drama and Dramatising Dreams

Towards a Reading of Sexuality in Shakespeare's Cymbeline

Dreams, then, are often most profound when they seem most crazy.... The Prince in the play ... was behaving just as dreams do in reality; so that we can say of dreams what Hamlet said of himself ... 'I am but mad north-north-west; when the wind is southerly, I know a hawk from a hand-saw!'

Shakespeare's is a drama of dreams. The plays deal with fantasies like those of Twelfth Night. Having been proposed to by a beautiful widow whom he has just met, Sebastian expresses his ecstasy in terms of illusion:

What relish is in this? How runs the stream?
Or I am mad, or else this is a dream.
Let fancy still my sense in Lethe sleep;
If it be thus to dream, still let me sleep!

(IV. i. 59 - 62)

Elsewhere in the same play, Viola (who is dressed as a boy) hopes that Olivia has not fallen for her: 'Poor lady, she were better love a dream' (II. ii. 24) and even the profundly prosaic Malvolio has fantasies - as Toby tells Maria of the hoax letter from Olivia, 'thou hast put him in such a dream that when the image of it leaves him he must run mad' (II. v. 173).

Social Shakespeare: V

Long before Freud interpreted dreams as the bubbling to the surface of instants of wish-fulfilment, Shakespeare understood their relationship to the unarticulated desires of individuals. Peculiarly, it is from the mouth of one of his severest cynics that Shakespeare expresses the delicate magic of the dream world. In I. iv, of Romeo and Juliet, Mercutio points out that the dream and the dreamer share an obvious affinity. The monarch of dreams, Queen Mab, > gallops night by night

> Through lovers' brains, and then they dream of love;
> O'er courtiers' knees, that dream on curtsies straight;
> O'er lawyers' fingers who straight dream on fees;
> O'er ladies' lips, who straight on kisses dream...
> Sometime she driveth o'er a soldier's neck,
> And then dreams he of cutting foreign throats.

(I. iv. 70 - 83)

Romeo's self-centred impatience, punctures Mercutio's mysticism:

> Merc: True, I talk of dreams, Which are the children of an idle brain, Begot of nothing but vain fantasy; Which is as thin of substance as the air, And more inconstant than the wind.

(I. iv. 95 - 100)

For all his ironic self-deprecation, there is about Mercutio's dream-speak an eerie grandiloquence, a psychological magnificence. This is not merely the result of the other-worldliness of Mab, or even of the horror she inspires but is, in part at least, caused by our recognition of the potency of dreaming and fantasy. Nothing is more authentic to each of us than our own imaginations and like our own dreams, drama offers 'an experience at once unreal and yet more than real'.

In a moment of indulgent reverie, Cleopatra relishes the liberation of imagination (or 'fancy' as Shakespeare called it) that sleep permits: 'I dreamt there was an Emperor Antony - / O, such another sleep' (V. ii. 76 - 77). Shylock's fantasy is suitably materialistic: 'I did dream of money-bags to-night' (II. v. 18). Richard of Gloucester's fantasy is political: 'I do but dream on sovereignty ... I'll make my heaven to dream upon the crown' (III Henry VI, III. ii. 134, 168). For Romeo, Juliet is just too good to be true:
'O blessed, blessed night! I am afeard, / Being in night, all this is but a dream, / Too flattering-sweet to be substantial' (II. ii. 139 - 141). These kinds of dreams offer the sleeper an idealised territory for the examination and fulfilment of secret desire. Such inspirations are not always so welcome though. Antigonus, in The Winter's Tale, delivers the baby Perdita to the hostile elements and recounts the vision of its mother which, inspired by his guilt at his part in this infanticide, haunts him:

Come, poor babe.
I have heard, but not believ'd, the spirits o' th' dead
May walk again. If such thing be, thy mother
Appear'd to me last night; for ne'er was dream
So like a waking.

(III. iii. 15 - 19)

---

2 Julia Kristeva calls Mab, a 'gnomelike ghost, fascinating and hideous, ruler of amorous bodies, the dark, drunken, and murderous other side of loving radiance'. (Romeo and Juliet: Love-hatred in the couple', in Shakespearean Tragedy,

The hallucination of Hermione goes on to tell him that his punishment will be that he will never see his wife again. Sure enough, the dream comes true - twenty lines later there follows that furiously tragic stage direction: Exit, pursued by a bear.

Macbeth, that sustained nightmare of history, contains the following lines on the surreptitious and iniquitous nature of dreams: 'Now o'er the one half-world / Nature seems dead, and wicked dreams abuse / The curtain'd sleep' (II. i. 49 - 51). Nightmares dog the couple. Macbeth hath murdered sleep and can neither eat nor sleep in peace because of 'the affliction of these terrible dreams / That shake us nightly' (III. ii. 18 - 19).

'I dreamt last night of the three Weird Sisters,' Banquo tells him. 'I think not of them,' (II. i. 20 - 22) the Thane evasively replies. It is a nightmare, we remember, about washing blood that drives Lady Macbeth to suicide. Hamlet too is in desperate need of sedatives: 'I could be bounded in a nut-shell and count myself a king of infinite space, were it not that I have bad dreams' (II. ii. 253). Even his resolve to follow Lady Macbeth in suicide is thwarted by the possibility of imaginative anarchy:

```
To die, to sleep;
To sleep, perchance to dream. Ay, there's the rub;
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause.

(III. i. 64 - 68)
```

Dreams as omens or prophecies also fascinate the playwright. Calphurnia's dream of her husband's statue spouting blood which prognosticates the slaughter of Caesar is adroitly reinterpreted by the scheming Decius, who has been sent to ensure that the Emperor will attend the Senate to be killed:

```
This dream is all amiss interpreted;
It was a vision fair and fortunate.
```
Your statue spouting blood in many pipes,
In which so many smiling Romans bath'd,
Signifies that from you great Rome shall suck
Reviving blood, and that great men shall press
For tinctures, stains, relics, and cognizance.
This by Calphurnia's dream is signified.

(II. ii. 83 - 90)

Decius refutes the literalism of the vision interpreting the spouting statue allegorically. Later in the play however, when the conspirators stoop to wash their hands in Caesar's blood, Calphurnia's prescience is horribly reified. In a play full of auguries, omens and dreams, Caesar's tragedy is that he refuses to be literal-minded about them. With unconscious but trenchant irony he dismisses the soothsayer who warns him of the ides of March with the words: 'He is a dreamer; let us leave him. Pass' (I. ii. 24). Caesar's self-importance and political persona force him to overlook the possibilities of clairvoyance. In Troilus and Cressida the direful dreams of the woeful Andromache are similarly discounted even though their forecast of the death of Hector accords with the visions of Cassandra. 'My dreams will, sure, prove ominous to the day' (V. iii. 6), she tells him. Even King Priam's patriarchal authority is not enough to validate these prophecies:

Come, Hector, come, go back.
Thy wife hath dreamt; thy mother hath had visions;
Cassandra doth foresee; and I myself
Am like a prophet suddenly enrapt
To tell thee that this day is ominous.
Therefore, come back.

(V. iii. 62 - 67)

Like Caesar though, Hector's sense of self and the importance of public display, blind him to the possible authenticity of these talismanic visions and like Caesar, Hector ends up dead. Leontes on the other hand, is prepared to overrule all external evidence which gives the lie to his own privileged grasp of 'reality' as it is inscribed in his ominous dreaming. Early in The Winter's Tale, he debates with himself as to whether he should believe the evidence under his nose - that he has a loving wife - or whether he should follow the absurd misgivings of his own fancy, which suggest to him that she is sleeping with his best friend:

_Affection! thy intention stabs the centre._
_Thou dost make possible things not so held,_
_Communicat'st with dreams - how can this be? -_
_With what's unreal thou coactive art,_
_And fellow'st nothing._

(I. ii. 138 - 142)

During the trial scene, Hermione pathetically tries to reassure her husband that she is the woman of his dreams. He accepts that she is, but tragically, it is in his very dreams that she is dishonest:

_Herm: My life stands in the level of your dreams,_
_Which I'll lay down._

_Leon: Your actions are my dreams._
_You had a bastard by Polixenes,_
_And I but dream'd it._

(III. ii. 79 - 82)

Brabantio is similarly precipitous in believing the truth of his fancy before the strict confirmation of hard fact. Iago and Roderigo inform him that his precious daughter is making the 'beast with two backs'. 'This accident' he replies, 'is not unlike my dream' (I. i. 143). Later in the play, it is of course the story of Cassio's wet-dream which convinces Othello of his wife's infidelity. Despite the fact that Iago has scripted the dream, it is given a dangerous credence in as much as it seems to tally with Othello's existing suspicions:

_Othe: O monstrous! monstrous!_
_Iago: Nay, this was but his dream._
Social Shakespeare: V

Othe: But this denoted a foregone conclusion.
Iago: 'Tis a shrewd doubt, though it be but a dream,
And this may help to thicken other proofs
That do demonstrate thinly.

(III. iii. 431 -435)

In The Winter's Tale and Othello, the characters prioritise their own dreams in the teeth of factual opposition, and this is what makes these plays studies in psychosis. The audience knows that it should rely on the instinctive virtues of Hermione and Desdemona, and that the fantasies of jealous husbands, albeit that they are ratified by their own paranoid dreams, are likely to be increasingly unsound as they become more deeply felt.

At the end of his 'Ode to a Nightingale' the speaker of Keats's poem challenges himself to determine whether or not he is in the land of consciousness:

Forlorn! the very word is like a bell
To toll me back from thee to my sole self!
Adieu! the fancy cannot cheat so well
As she is fam'd to do, deceiving elf.
Adieu! adieu! thy plaintive anthem fades
Past the near meadows, over the still stream,
Up the hill-side; and now 'tis buried deep
In the next valley-glades:
Was it a vision, or a waking dream?
Fled is that music: - Do I wake or sleep?

Shakespearean characters have frequently to ask themselves the same question. Master Ford in The Merry Wives of Windsor, cannot believe his ears having been informed (while in disguise) that Falstaff intends to act as his wife's pimp: 'Hum! ha! Is this a vision? Is this a dream? Do I sleep? Master Ford, awake; awake Master Ford.' (III. v. 124). Propositioned by his twin brother's wife (whom he has never met), Antipholus of Syracuse interrogates himself thus: 'What, was I married to her in my dream? / Or sleep I now, and think I hear all this? / What error drives our eyes and ears amiss?' (The Comedy of Errors, II. ii. 181 - 183). In a rather more savage example, Leonato in Much Ado About Nothing, finds it impossible to accept that the slanders of sexual misconduct levelled at his daughter on her wedding day, come from anywhere except his darkest nightmares: 'Are these things spoken, or do I but dream?' (IV. i. 65). By way of answer, the frenzied and cruelly adamant Claudio adopts the interrogative tone and cynically dispels any doubt by asking a series of absurd rhetorical questions: 'Leonato, stand I here? / Is this the Prince? Is this the Prince's brother? / Is this face Hero's? Are our eyes our own?' (IV. i. 68 - 70).

---

Romeo too has to ask himself to determine whether his fears are founded in the real world or are merely the misgivings of his own worst conceits:

What said my man, when my betossed soul
Did not attend him as we rode? I think
He told me Paris should have married Juliet.
Said he not so, or did I dream it so?
Or am I mad, hearing him talk of Juliet,
To think it was so?

(V. iii. 76 - 81)

Romeo's dread about the potential deception of dreaming is a fear shared with the audience as Romeo and Juliet begins its final act. Juliet has died at the end of Act IV and this is immediately followed by the blithe entrance of Romeo celebrating a vision of reverie with his beloved, 'If I may trust the flattering truth of sleep, / My dreams presage some joyful news at hand' (V. i. 1 - 2). In David Leveaux's 1991 production for the RSC the contrast between Romeo's fantasy and the reality of Juliet's death was heightened by having her suspended in her bedchamber (which later doubled as her tomb) above the ecstatic lover. Not all visions are to be believed; tragically in Romeo and Juliet, dreams only come true when linked to images of death. Balthasar, Romeo's servant, tells Lawrence how he has dreamt of the violence of Romeo, a vision which transpires to coincide with the death of Paris: 'As I did sleep under this yew tree here, / I dreamt my master and another fought, / And that my master slew him' (V. iii. 137 - 139). The uncertainty of the dream facilitates the obvious parallel of Paris's murder with the earlier stabbing of Tybalt.

With characteristic ultimacy, King Lear takes the idea of dreaming ever closer to the borders of nihilism. When he awakes in front of his youngest daughter after his madness on the heath, the king hasn't merely returned from the land of sleep but, it seems, from the land of the dead. Significantly, the self-questioning that we have witnessed above, is here substituted by a moving certainty that Lear's vision of Hell is terrifyingly true. To begin with, others ask him the questions:

Cord: How does my royal Lord? How fares your Majesty?
Lear: You do me wrong to take me out o' th' grave.
   Thou art a soul in bliss; but I am bound
   Upon a wheel of fire, that mine own tears
   Do scald like molten lead.
Cord: Sir, do you know me?
Lear: You are a spirit, I know. Where did you die?
   (IV. vii. 44 - 49)

Gradually, as Lear comes round from the horror of his imaginative Hell, he begins to ask himself questions. These questions signify the space he is trying to place between himself and the landscape of his mind: 'Where have I been? Where am I? Fair daylight?' (l. 52). Finally, with the aid of external evidence, Lear establishes that he is alive, but the questions continue to rupture his certitude: 'I will not swear these are my hands. Let's see. / I feel this pin prick. Would I were assur'd / Of my condition! ... Be your tears wet?
   ... Am I in France?' (ll. 55 - 76).
In each of the above cases, the bewilderment is caused by the erosion of the boundaries between the conscious and the unconscious mind. Shakespeare's dreamers are consistently attempting to limit the compass of their creative imaginations, effectively to separate their internal private fantasies from their socialised persona. This dichotomy feeds directly into the notion of drama itself, for what we are asked to perform, as an audience, is an imaginative act of faith - a collective dream. At the end of The Winter's Tale, Paulina tells Leontes that the statue of his wife will come to life for him but 'It is requir'd / You do awake your faith' (V. iii. 94 - 95). The art of Hermione's statue will become life only if Leontes believes that it can. The Winter's Tale is unique in Shakespeare's canon in that the audience is not allowed to know of the concealed life of Hermione. Usually, as I have shown in chapter II, the audience is 'let in' on Shakespeare's secrets, but here the statue awakes not merely for Leontes but for the audience too. This doubt in the audience's mind is vital to balance the seemingly unsubstantiated jealously earlier on. What this means is that, in the final scene, Hermione is life pretending to be art while Leontes and the audience see her as art pretending to be life. If our dreams come true, if the statue does come to life, it is because we have learned along with Polixenes that 'the art itself is nature' (IV. iv. 97) and that the very theatre is able to dodge rationalistic desires for consistency and truth. In the Leicester Haymarket production of 1991, Simon Usher punctured the dream world of the play. For the first and only time in my experience, the statue was actually a statue - usually it is Hermione standing very still (see plate E). As the real Hermione entered, on crutches and physically scarred, Leontes had a very real choice between idealised art and imperfect nature. The production challenged the play's faith in the efficacy of dreaming. Dreams, the production implied, don't always come true.
As I have said, Shakespeare's is a drama of dreams; and this is true not merely in the sense that characters in it have dreams, nightmares, fantasies, or prophetic imaginings but also in the sense that Shakespeare's theatre itself is a place in which we are willing, in Coleridge's phrase, to suspend our disbelief. Shakespeare is continually promoting the idea of drama as a shared fantasy. At the end of The Tempest (and towards the end of Shakespeare's own career in drama) Prospero remarks upon the fusion of dramatic and rhapsodic illusion:

Our revels now are ended. These our actors,
As I foretold you, were all spirits, and
Are melted into air, into thin air;
And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind. We are such stuff
As dreams are made on; and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep.

(IV. i. 148 - 158)

The speech is studded with references to Shakespeare's stagecraft. 'The cloud-capp'd towers [and] the gorgeous palaces,' the temples and racks are references to the increasingly elaborate stage machinery of the court masques with which the late plays have so much in common. The descent of Jupiter in Cymbeline and masque of the goddesses and the disappearing feast in The Tempest are masque-like features of the late plays. But Shakespeare has fond memories for his old stamping grounds - it is difficult to overlook 'the great globe itself' as a reference to the Globe theatre which opened in 1599 with a production of Julius Caesar and was burned in 1613 after a canon set fire to the thatched roof during a performance of Henry VIII.

Shakespeare's is an urgently self-conscious art. The dream that the audience are required to indulge themselves in, is consistently foregrounded by the playwright. In Henry V, Shakespeare apologises to the audience for the confined space of the theatre:

```
But pardon, gentles all,
The flat unraised spirits that hath dar'd
On this unworthy scaffold to bring forth
So great an object. Can this cockpit hold
The vasty fields of France? Or may we cram
Within this wooden O the very casques
That did afright the air at Agincourt?
O pardon! since a crooked figure may
Attest in little place a million;
And let us, ciphers to this great accompt,
On your imaginary forces work.
```

(Prologue. 8 - 18)

The Renaissance open-air theatre appears again as 'this wooden O' and the audience are asked at the beginning of each act to place themselves in the illusion of the drama: 'Still be kind, / And eke out our performance with your mind' (Chorus. III. 34 - 35).

---

5 Jonson's Hymenaei had been recently staged (1606). Its scenery, which had aroused much comment, included a great globe. (I am indebted to Richard Dutton for this.)

Perhaps Shakespeare's most extended meditation on the dream of drama and the drama of dream is his play A Midsummer Night's Dream. It is a play about dreams as it is a play about drama. The dreamscape of the Athenian forest is punctuated with phantasmagoric fantasies inscribing the delicate hinterlands of adolescent sexual desire within the acceptable boundaries of socialised behaviour. It is only in the forest that Hermia could dream of a snake that eats her heart away while her lover looks on voyeuristically, only in the forest where a fairy queen could desire to couple bestially with an ass. These kinds of dotage - the former being the obsessive pursuit of unrequited love and the latter the bestowal of love on an unworthy object - are examples of unsocialised wish-fulfilment, individual desires, dreams. These fanciful misconstructions are aberrations caused by a negation of the 'correct'/normalised/socialised frames of reference. The solipsism of dreaming corresponds to the imaginative autonomy of the audience itself. It is no accident that the romantic fragility of the forest is continually broken by the assembly of rude mechanicals who, of all things, are rehearsing a play. The insistent references in the play to eyes and seeing enforce the potentiality of misinterpretation, both of dreams and of drama. Puck's love-juice rubbed on the eyes, causes love at first sight and yet we have already heard that this is the most unreliable kind of involvement:

Love looks not with the eyes, but with the mind;
And therefore is wing'd Cupid painted blind.
Nor hath Love's mind of any judgement taste;
Wings, and no eyes, figure unheedy haste.

(I. i. 234 - 237)

A Midsummer Night's Dream is a sustained exploration into the nature, value and function of the art of illusion: drama - where actors pretend to be characters they are not, where they pretend to speak spontaneously lines which have been deliberately committed to memory. The illusions generated by the characters themselves, and the illusions that they foist on each other form the super-ordinate illusion, the one which governs and dictates the structure of all others - the play itself: A Midsummer Night's Dream. Puck, a rather teasingly malevolent version of Cupid, as he leads each through the forest, plays the parts of Lysander to Demetrius and Demetrius to Lysander. He also plays director to Oberon's producer, as the lovers are manipulated to fall in love with each other. When they awake, they are quick to attribute the story of the night to their own overactive dreams:

_Deme:_ Are you sure
That we are awake? It seems to me
That yet we sleep, we dream. Do not you think
The Duke was here and bid us follow him?

_Herm:_ Yea, and my father.

_Hele:_ And Hippolyta.

_Lysa:_ And he did bid us follow to the temple.

_Deme:_ Why, then, we are awake; let's follow him;
And by the way let us recount our dreams.

_(IV. i. 189 - 196)_

The suggestion that the characters have been sleeping of course conflicts directly with the audience's experience of the play. Had these four really been lying on the ground for twelve hours, the play would be quite different from the one we have just watched. We know, even if they do not, that their dreams are our drama, and the waking of Bottom, which immediately follows their exit, reinforces this equation:

_[Waking]_ When my cue comes, call me and I will answer. My next is 'Most fair Pyramus'. Heigh-ho! Peter Quince! Flute, the bellowsmender! Snout, the tinker! Starveling! God's my life, stol'n hence, and left me asleep! I have had a most rare vision. I have had a dream, past the wit of any man to say what dream it was. Man is but an ass if he go about to expound this dream.... I will get Peter Quince to write a ballad of this dream: it shall be called 'Bottom's Dream' because it hath no bottom; and I will sing it in the latter end of a play, before the Duke.

(IV. i. 197 - 215)

Bottom, the gross actor-manager who would, if he could, take all the available parts in the rustics' play, is the focus for these twinned issues of drama and dream. He is, of all the play's mortals, the only one to see the fairies, and yet his literal-mindedness demands that the peculiarities of his vision be adapted for the stage. Paradoxically the most obvious clown in the whole play recognises the synonymous nature of dreams and drama. It would be foolish to interpret the dream, he says, because it has taken place in his own head. All he can try to do is to re-enact it through a play. It is called 'Bottom's Dream', firstly because it belongs to him and secondly because it has no imaginative or dramatical life unless he is its author. Bottom's Dream is literally Bottom's dream; the play is the dream, the art itself is nature. Bottom's propensity to interrupt the court entertainment points up his inability to separate drama and dream. To assuage the ladies' fears, they must be informed that the actor is not really a lion, that the stage deaths are not real and so on. Framed as it is within the larger comic benevolence of the Dream, the tragical story of Pyramus and Thisbe, is completely defused. It is comical precisely because the dream of its illusion is continually ruptured. The court audience and the theatre audience are consistently woken from the illusion of the drama by the actors' intrusions. If such intrusions had not occurred, such a play could indeed require us to respond to it as a tragedy. Shakespeare at about the same time as he wrote the Dream, was composing a version of Pyramus and Thisbe without its ingressive interruptions; this play he called Romeo and Juliet.

A Midsummer Night's Dream finally leaves us by drawing to our attention its own harmlessness and, at the same time, it makes us aware of the importance of fantasy or dreaming:
If we shadows have offended,
Think but this, and all is mended,
That you have but slumber'd here
While these visions did appear.
And this weak and idle theme,
No more yielding but a dream,
Gentles, do not reprehend.
If you pardon, we will mend.

(V. i. 412 - 419)

Puck attempts to persuade those of us who are upset by the Dream that it is nothing more than the product of our own fantasies: that the drama is dream. As Norman N. Holland succinctly puts it, 'what has happened [in A Midsummer Night's Dream] is our dream.'

In Shakespeare's English, the word shadow meant 'spirit' or 'ghost' but it also meant 'actor'. Puck's opening line again draws attention through this pun to the acting of the Dream itself. Macbeth uses the word similarly: 'Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player, / That struts and frets his hour on the stage, / And then is heard no more' (V. v. 24 - 26) and Hamlet plays with the pun as he asserts lugubriously that 'A dream itself is but a shadow' (II. ii. 259).

Shakespeare's most sustained consideration of the parallel between dreaming and acting takes place in the induction to The Taming of the Shrew. The drunk Christopher Sly, having been ejected from a pub, falls down and asleep in the street. A hunt passes by and the Lord suggests that Sly be picked up and taken back to his chamber. The Lord instructs his servants to pretend that the drunk has been in a coma for fifteen years and that he is really a noble aristocrat:

---

8 Norman N. Holland, 'Hermia's Dream', in Representing Shakespeare, 1 - 20, p. 11.

9 Interestingly the verb to cast is used in several relevant contexts here. To cast a shadow is noted by the OED from 1300. To cast actors in the sense of allotting parts is recorded as 1711 though it is unlikely that the word was not in use earlier than this. Another pertinent meaning of cast is to 'to interpret a dream', first recorded as 1382.
Some one be ready with a costly suit,
And ask him what apparel he will wear;
Another tell him of his hounds and horse,
And that his lady mourns at his disease;
Persuade him that he hath been lunatic,
And, when he says he is, say that he dreams,
For he is nothing but a mighty lord.

(Induction. I. 57 - 63)

Sly's response to all this trickery is predictably gullible:

Am I a lord and have I such a lady?
Or do I dream? Or have I dream'd till now?
I do not sleep: I see, I hear, I speak;
I smell sweet savours, and I feel soft things.
Upon my life, I am a lord indeed,
And not a tinker, nor Christopher Sly.

(Induction. II. 66 - 71)

Like Master Ford, the lovers in A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Lear, Sly cannot tell the difference between consciousness and unconsciousness. This time the evidence seems to imply that he really is a lord and that the life of Christopher Sly that he believes is real has been nothing but a sustained dream. The life he is sure he remembers has formed the basis of his dormant mutterings: 'though you lay here in this goodly chamber, / Yet would you say ye were beaten out of door; / And rail upon the hostess of the house'
(Induction. II. 82 - 84). The irony of this servant's report is of course that this is exactly how the play opens. In other words, the beginning of the Shrew, that we have just witnessed, has now become the substance of a dream; the dream has subsumed the drama. But of course the twist is that the dream is a confidence trick and therefore the drama is more real than the dream. This confusion is something that the play anticipates, as the Lord of the hunt remarks that Sly will find the whole situation as strange 'Even as a flatt'ring dream or worthless fancy' (Induction. I. 42). The fusion between drama and dream does not merely confuse Sly, but the audience of the Shrew. As Richard Dutton puts it, 'Sly's 'dream' and the experience of watching a play become one and the same thing. In Bill Alexander's 1992 RSC version of the play, Sly and the aristocrats of the inductions sat on a raised dais facing down stage and watched the entire play as it took place in front of them. Obviously the actors in the main play had their backs to their own audience and the theatre audience accepted this as a convention which allowed them to see the play. This was an effective if not successful way of sustaining the awareness of the illusory nature of dramatic representation. In The Shrew and elsewhere, Shakespeare's drama is continually urging us to recognise that without our own inspiration, our own imaginative contribution, the drama will never be as real as our wildest dreams.

II

Critical opinions of Cymbeline have often been uncomplimentary. In his General Observations on the Plays of Shakespeare (1756), Dr Johnson wrote with characteristic impenent gusto:

> To remark the folly of the fiction, the absurdity of the conduct, the confusion of the names, and manners of different times, and the impossibility of the events in any system of life, were to waste criticism upon unresisting imbecility, upon faults too evident for detection, and too gross for aggravation.

Johnson's impatience is symptomatic of the peculiar difficulties of Cymbeline. These difficulties arise out of the play's propensity to take the dream/drama conflation that we have been considering one stage further. Cymbeline is a jumble of dream sequences. Indeed, D. E. Landry begins her essay on the play with the sentence, 'Cymbeline is most remarkably a play about dreams, about the various and often inexplicable functions of the unconscious mind.' For Landry, it is the very confusion of the play which makes it so dreamlike, 'a world of doublings, disguises, misnamings, and mistaken identities, the conventions both of romantic or tragicomic drama and of dreams.' That these kinds of qualities and confusions belong to drama has been demonstrated above in chapter II; that they belong to dream, Freud testifies:

---

11 Part of the trouble was that this convention was not used consistently. Actors in the play often had to turn upstage to address 'their' audience and the playing direction was thus unfortunately Janus-faced. For a fuller account of this production, see my review, Cahiers Elisabethains (forthcoming).

There is often a passage in even the most thoroughly interpreted dream which has to be left obscure ... because ... there is a tangle of dream thoughts which cannot be unravelled. This is the dream's navel, the spot where it reaches down into the unknown. The dream thoughts ... cannot, from the nature of things, have any definite endings; they are bound to branch out in every direction into the intricate network of our world of thought. 13

Complications in the play are legion. It is frequently noted (as it is by Johnson) that although the play takes place historically around 10AD, Giacomo in his compelling adroitness, his capacity to reverse his arguments and to manipulate the English naiveté of Posthumus and Innogen, represents an incarnation of the Elizabethan Italianate bogeyman, Machiavelli. Cymbeline then straddles about fourteen centuries and shifts from the one to the other without apparent difficulty. Much else in Johnson's objection points up the dream-like aspect of the play. He mentions its improbability and in relation to this accusation the play does not really have a leg to stand on. Innogen is mistaken for Fidele by her own husband and father while she herself mistakes the corpse of Cloten for that of her husband. Fleeing from the court, she just happens to stumble into the hovel of her long-lost brothers. The battle scenes hinge around the belligerent magnificence of these brothers, an exiled courtier and a despairing husband. Between the four of them they successfully demolish the entire Roman army. Again, Johnson is worried about the plethora of pseudonyms in the play. Belarius, Guiderius and Arviragus all have alternative names, while at different points in the play, in addition to these three, Innogen, Posthumus, Cloten and Giacomo all disguise themselves. The final scene with its mysterious prophetic resolution and its almost comical series of dénouements would seem to be all the evidence that Johnson would require. But perhaps the most pointed instance of far-fetchedness would be the dream of Posthumus and the descent of Jupiter. In all of these ways, Cymbeline is the stuff that dreams are made on.

---

Murray M. Schwartz notes 'the play's pervasive indirection [and] its lack of coherent atmosphere.' The virtues of a play with improbable action and a want of coherence are to do with precisely the kinds of dramaturgy that I have been considering above. As the critic Meredith Skura writes:

> I think ... what happens as we look at Cymbeline ... is that we can see the terms conscious and unconscious as a misleading polarity. What we really experience instead of either of these extremes is a range of different ways of being aware.

Cymbeline then forces us to problematise the taxonomic distinction between reality and dreaming while at the same time it problematises the distinction between reality and drama. In the words of Roger Warren, the play is marked by 'its capacity to astonish and to move an audience at the same time.' He calls this quality 'theatrical virtuosity' and his further description of the idiosyncrasy is germane here, 'in the moments of extremest theatrical virtuosity, the action on stage can emerge as the externalisation of ... dreams.' In this sense, Cymbeline can be thought of as a series of dream sequences and in production this is an aspect of the play with which disparate directors have recently engaged.

---

17 Meredith Skura, 'Interpreting Posthumus' Dream from Above and Below: Families, Psychoanalysts, and Literary Critics', in Representing Shakespeare, 203 - 216, p. 204.

The paradox of dreaming is that it is real and unreal at the same time. Just like a dream, the drama is real for the course of its duration, and after its close it is just a drama. The director of the BBC Shakespeare Cymbeline, Elijah Moshinsky (whose most recent previous production was significantly A Midsummer Night's Dream), remarks on the play's dreamlike quality:

> for me the centre of it is that there are two levels of action. There's an objective level of action and there's a subjective level of action and the subjective level of action is like a series of nightmares,... I think the play centres round ... therapeutic dreams.

Moshinsky's recognition of Shakespeare's fantastic dramatic technique helps us to deal with the objections of Johnson. In requiring the play to make literal sense, Johnson's pragmatism is in danger of occluding the imaginative flexibility that Cymbeline offers us,
In a nutshell, 'Freud argued that the unconscious is a system of "drives", especially childhood wishes, which is suppressed in the normal course of maturation when the child becomes socialised and accepts the constraints of civilisation (especially the sexual constraints).’ Having undergone their sexual initiation, the lovers in A Midsummer Night's Dream, As You Like It, and The Winter's Tale can return to the court where their sexual activity is ratified by the socialised structure of marriage. The situation in Cymbeline is somewhat different. Posthumus and Innogen are married and have probably already slept together - presumably this is how Posthumus knows about the mole on Innogen's breast. What we have here then is not a movement towards sexual union but a rupturing of it where it has already taken place. Innogen is exposed in the absence of her husband to two suitors: Giacomo and Cloten. The first, as he tells Posthumus, makes his 'wager rather against your confidence than her reputation' (I. iv. 106); in other words, there is no initial sexual motivation. It is not until he meets Innogen that his poetry becomes sexually charged.

In the trunk scene, Shakespeare has gone to a good deal of trouble to reinforce the dramaturgy of dreaming that we have been exploring above. Giacomo's first words imply both the silence of the bedchamber and the vulnerability of the sleeping beauty: 'The crickets sing, and man's o'er-labour'd sense / Repairs itself by rest' (II. ii. 11 - 12). Innogen has apparently just been reading the story of the rape of Philomel from Ovid's Metamorphoses. In Titus Andronicus, the raped and mutilated Lavinia (whose tongue has been cut out) informs her family of her suffering by opening the book at the same page. Symbolically the trunk scene is an act of rape: 'Our Tarquin thus / Did softly press the rushes ere he waken'd / The chastity he wounded' (II. ii. 12 - 14). Schwartz notes that 'Giacomo's entrance ... represents an overdetermined act of penetration.' The chamber itself is jotted down in a fairly neutral tone:

---

I will write all down:
Such and such pictures; there the window; such
Th' adornment of her bed; the arras, figures -
Why, such and such; and the contents o' th' story.

(II. ii. 24 - 27)

But by the time the description is recounted to Posthumus, it is imbued with a dramatic eroticism. The exotic tapestry depicting Cleopatra's meeting with Antony is thematically appropriate, and the detail of the swelling Cydnus is more important for its connotations than its accuracy. The 'two winking Cupids' and the 'golden cherubins' (II. iv. 88 - 89) seem coyly to assent to the sexual activity which Giacomo claims to have enjoyed. Perhaps the most energised feature of the description is that of the carving on the chimney:

The chimney
Is south the chamber, and the chimney-piece
Chaste Dian bathing. Never saw I figures
So likely to report themselves. The cutter
Was as another nature, dumb; outwent her,
Motion and breath left out.

(II. iv. 80 - 85)

23 Earlier in his career, Shakespeare had written a full length poem on The Rape of Lucrece.
24 Schwartz, 'Between Fantasy and Imagination', p. 238.
25 On the rivers Cydnus and Nile as sexual totems, see chapter IV.
To look at this sculpture is to cast oneself in the voyeuristic position of Acteon (again from Ovid) who, while hunting, peered through the rushes to see the naked goddess. He was spotted and transformed into a stag and torn to pieces by his own hounds. The relevance of this work of art is of course that Dian is the goddess of chastity, and our watching her represents a violation. Giacomo is of course trying to persuade Posthumus that just such a violation has occurred to Innogen. Before resorting to the cunning of hiding in the trunk, Giacomo has attempted to incite Innogen to infidelity by contrasting her faithfulness with what he pretends is Posthumus's licentiousness:

Should he make me
Live like Diana's priest betwixt cold sheets,
Whiles he is vaulting variable ramps,
In your despite, upon your purse? Revenge it.

(I. vi. 131 - 134)

At the end of the play, this motif of Diana is reiterated. During the course of his explanation as to how he came to possess Posthumus's ring, Giacomo tells Cymbeline that Posthumus has spoken of his wife 'as Dian had hot dreams / And she alone were cold' (V. v. 180 - 181). The trunk scene itself becomes a 'hot dream' as Giacomo changes focus from the room to the body of Innogen.

Cytherea,
How bravely thou becom'st thy bed! fresh lily,
And whiter than the sheets! That I might touch!
But kiss; one kiss! Rubies unparagon'd,
How dearly they do t!

(II. ii. 14 - 18)

When Milton's Satan sees Eve for the first time, he is so overcome by her beauty that his mission of evil is stopped in its tracks:

26 Cf Twelfth Night, I. i. 21 - 23.
Such pleasure took the serpent to behold
This flow'ry plat, the sweet recess of Eve
Thus early, thus alone; her heav'nly form
Angelic, but more soft and feminine,
Her graceful innocence, her every air
Of gesture or least action overawed
His malice, and with rapine sweet bereaved
His fierceness of the fierce intent it brought.
That space the Evil One abstracted stood
From his own evil, and for the time remained Stupidly good, of enmity disarmed

(Paradise Lost, IX. 455 - 465)

The irony of Milton's description is that Satan's evil is taken from him by an act of 'rapine sweet'. The rapist is instantaneously the raped. This is exactly the situation of Giacomo in Innogen's bedchamber, ravished as he is by her beauty. Robert Lindsay, who played Giacomo in Moshinsky's production regards the scene as 'pornographic' and Tim Piggot-Smith who took the role in Peter Hall's 1988 National Theatre production speaks even more strongly of the intrusion, '[Giacomo] has let loose the potential of something diabolic. He has seen, for the first time, the ideal woman - and then he goes ahead and blasphemes the temple'. Giacomo compares her to the lily and indeed we know she is pale because Pisanio tells her that in her affectation of a boy's disguise, she will have to cast off the mask she wears to protect her complexion: 'you must / Forget that rarest treasure of your cheek, / Exposing it ... to the greedy touch / Of common-kissing Titan' (III. iv. 158 - 162). Again at her mock funeral, Guiderius addresses his dead sister as 'O sweetest, fairest lily' (IV. ii. 202). Like Perdita and Ophelia, Innogen is consistently imaged in terms of the natural world and especially flowers. 'On her left breast / A mole cinque-spotted, like the crimson drops / I' th' bottom of a cowslip' (II. ii. 37 - 39); the moment is again a blend of dark voyeurism and vulnerable nescience. The 1987 RSC production of Cymbeline was staged in the round of The (old) Other Place. As Donald Sumpter's Giacomo pulled back the bedsheets, and unlaced Innogen's night-shirt, the first 27 Lindsay in BBC Cymbeline, p. 24; Piggott-Smith in Warren, Staging Shakespeare's Late Plays, p. 44.

three or four rows of necks craned forwards to have a peep at the naked Harriet Walter.
The scene is perversely alluring.

In the sources of the story, the mole is likened to a rose or a violet. The change to the cowslip is I think significant. In A Midsummer Night's Dream, one of the fairies tells Puck that 'I must go and seek some dewdrops here, / And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear' (II. i. 14 - 15) and in The Tempest Ariel sings: 'Where the bee sucks, there suck I; / In a cowslip's bell I lie' (V. i. 88 - 89). In both these instances the cowslip appears in a context that is gentle, undefiled, playful, and most important, innocent. This of course is critical in the trunk scene and contributes to the delicate sensuousness of Innogen; indeed it is her very innocence that incenses Giacomo even further (just as it is Eve's that so excites Satan). In his misogynist ranting, Posthumus confirms that Innogen was sexually modest even with her husband:

> Me of my lawful pleasure she restrain'd,
> And pray'd me oft forbearance; did it with
> A pudency so rosy, the sweet view on't
> Might well have warm'd old Saturn; that I thought her
> As chaste as unsunn'd snow.

(II. v. 9 - 13)

The sweet view of the 'pudency so rosy' refers of course to Innogen's flushed embarrassment but in addition, if we remember that the words pudency and pudendum have the same root, 'the sweet view on't' is also the ultimate act of scopophilia - no wonder even old Saturn could become aroused! This reading is substantiated when we remember that the love tokens that signify Innogen's virginity are also virginal symbols.
At the end of The Merchant of Venice the thuggish loudmouth Gratiano, makes explicit the connection between the possession of his wife's ring and her fidelity: 'Well, while I live, I'll fear no other thing / So sore as keeping safe Nerissa's ring' (V. i. 306 - 307). The obscene pun on soreness makes the double meaning of the ring perfectly clear. In the wager scene of the BBC Cymbeline, Robert Lindsay's Giacomo balances Posthumus's diamond ring (which he has received from his wife as a token of her fidelity) lewdly on his finger tip, while in the 1987 RSC version of the play, Giacomo thrust the amulet on his arm in a sexual gesture in the despairing face of Posthumus. The cover of the 1989 RSC programme (see plate F) emphasises the importance of the bracelet as a sexual totem. Naomi Wirthner's Innogen is naked, contorted in sleep and we look at her just as Giacomo would. On her arm and pointed up in a slightly golden tint is the amulet, Posthumus's 'manacle of love' (I. i. 122). In the words of Posthumus, the bracelet has become a 'corporal sign' (II. iv. 119) as much as the mole: 'symbolically, it presents the sight of the female genitals to Posthumus.' 28 In fact, it is its possession that convinces her husband of Innogen's betrayal even before the mole is mentioned.

This subtle and sophisticated mediation of sexual fantasy through symbols, through literary reference (to Ovid) and through the teasing evocation of the erotic (for example in Giacomo's description of the bedchamber) is grossly parodied by the sexuality that Cloten represents. Giacomo's sexuality is sublimated into the eroticisation of sight and touch. Cloten, by contrast, represents a strutting, swaggering sexuality which is related to his sense of political self-importance: 'I must go up and down like a cock that nobody can match' (II. i. 21): Cloten's sexuality is pre-genital. He is repeatedly associated with anality through a cluster of excretory vocabulary: 'reek', 'rot', 'vent', 'backside', 'smell', 'offence', 'south-fog' and so on. We are told that after the fight, he is stinking and requires a change of shirt. Cloten's manner of talking about sex is through a series of smutty jokes. Before the aubade outside Innogen's chamber Cloten remarks

I am advised to give her music a mornings; they say it will penetrate. Come on, tune. If you can penetrate her with your fingering, so. We'll try with tongue too. If none will do, let her remain; but I'll never give o'er.

(II. iii. 11 - 14)

Both Giacomo and Cloten see fidelity as something to be violated but the latter's infantile sexual pursuit, while it threatens rape, is altogether less alarming than Giacomo's manipulative prowess. Giacomo never has time to formulate plans ahead, but consistently moulds them according to the situation - his witty reversal in front of Innogen when he protests that he was 'just testing' is an example of this. Cloten on the other hand is, as it were, 'all mouth and no trousers'. He decides to follow Innogen to Milford-Haven in the clothes of her husband:

She said upon a time ... that she held the very garment of Posthumus in more respect than my noble and natural person, together with the adornment of my qualities. With that suit upon my back will I ravish her; first kill him ... when my lust hath dined - which, as I say, to vex her I will execute in the clothes that she so prais'd - to the court I'll knock her back, foot her home again. She hath despix'd me rejoicingly, and I'll be merry in my revenge.

(III. v. 134 - 146)

At the beginning of Act IV, Cloten enters in the garments of Posthumus and enjoys another dirty joke: "tis said a woman's fitness comes by fits' (IV. i. 6). He then almost completely reiterates his earlier intentions: 'Posthumus, thy head, which now is growing upon thy shoulders, shall within this hour be off; thy mistress enforced; thy garments cut to pieces before her face; and all this done, spurn her home to her father' (IV. i. 17 - 19). This repetition implies his own insecurity. His plan needs constant restating because fundamentally, Cloten is impotent. In his essay called Medusa's Head, Freud writes: 'decapitation = castration'.

Collected Works, XVIII, 273. See also the discussion of phallic potency in relation to Cleopatra, chapter IV above.
wesh to emasculate the husband so that Innogen will be available as his own sexual partner. Of course, it is Cloten that loses his head. Guiderius remarks: 'This Cloten was a fool, an empty purse; / There was no money in't. Not Hercules / Could have knock'd out his brains, for he had none' (IV. ii. 114 - 116). Not only does Cloten have no brains, but he is 'an empty purse'. Cloten's impotence is again reinforced; since the mid-fifteenth-century, the word purse was a slang expression for 'scrotum'.

Perhaps the most notable scene in the play which brings together the issues of dream and sexuality is that in which Innogen awakes next to the headless corpse of Cloten, which she assumes to be that of her husband. Granville-Barker called this scene 'dramatically inexcusable' and it is indeed disturbing in a play that ends, for the most part, happily. Like those countless examples we have considered, Innogen requires confirmation that she is not simply having a nightmare: 'I hope I dream ... / The dream's here still. Even when I wake it is / Without me, as within me; not imagin'd, felt' (IV. ii. 298 - 308) - not imagined, but as real as a dream, as real as a drama. Paradoxically, as she surveys the body, she recognises not its clothes, but its features. After all the fuss that Cloten has made about ravishing Innogen in her husband's clothes and after the amazing lengths to which the playwright has gone to arrange Innogen's awakening next to a headless corpse dressed as Posthumus, we would expect her to focus on the costume to the exclusion of all else, but it is very quickly dismissed:

A headless man? The garments of Posthumus?
I know the shape of's leg; this is his hand,
His foot Mercurial, his Martial thigh,

30 Compare Antonio's offer to Bassanio of 'My purse, my person' (The Merchant of Venice, I. i. 138). See also the discussion of jewels and stones in chapter VII below.

The brawns of Hercules; but his Jovial face - Murder in heaven! How! 'Tis gone.

(IV. ii. 309 - 313)

Just as Giacomo surveys her body for 'corporal signs' with which to verify his story, Innogen surveys the corpse for evidence with which to prove its identity. Michael Taylor notes the dark sexuality of the scene, writing of Innogen's 'necrophiliac embrace'.\(^{32}\) At the joint burial of the corpse and Fidele, the brothers sing her to 'Quiet consummation' (IV. ii. 281) and this consummation is symbolised by the rather disturbing close to the scene where she daubs her face hysterically with the blood from the severed neck. This is plainly a rite of passage - just like the smearing of the blood on the face of the freshman at the fox-hunt. Innogen makes the same error as Pyramus (in the production staged at the end of \textit{A Midsummer Night's Dream}) connecting blood and bereavement all too rapidly. The smearing of her face with blood is an initiation into the mystery of death. Of course the corpse is that of her potential rapist Cloten (whose name may itself suggest \textit{blood clot}) and so while this ritual blood smearing symbolises an affinity with the dead, a kind of bizarre communion for Innogen herself; for the audience, it stands for her victory over Cloten and his vicious intentions just as the gore that drenches Posthumus is a signifier of his martial virtuosity.\(^{33}\) A similar initiation occurs in \textit{As You Like It}, when Rosalind receives the bloody handkerchief and assumes it signifies the death of Orlando. Blood in both these instances, is a positive emblem, yet it is accompanied by illness. Both Rosalind and Innogen swoon. The presence of blood, their fainting, growing pale, and Innogen's insistent desire to be left alone imply that both women are menstruating.

\(^{32}\) \textit{Ibid.}, p. 98.

\(^{33}\) This was a strong feature of Hall's National production. A picture of the blood-drenched Peter Woodward playing the part is conveniently available in Warren, \textit{Staging Shakespeare's Late Plays}, plate 3.
Guid: Go you to hunting; I'll abide with him.
Inno: So sick I am not, yet I am not well:

But not so citizen a wanton as
To seem to die ere sick. So please you, leave me, ...
I am ill, but your being by me
Cannot amend me; society is no comfort
To one not sociable. I am not very sick,
Since I can reason of it.

(IV. ii. 6 - 14, my emphases)

In effect, Innogen is 'languish[ing] / A drop of blood a day' (I. i. 156 - 157) though the last thing she needs dressed as a boy and surrounded by three men is the onset of menstrual bleeding. 34 In As You Like It, Oliver attributes Rosalind's fainting to general squeamishness, but Celia insists mysteriously that 'There is more in it' (IV. iii. 158). Both Fidele and Ganymede have their assumed maleness subverted by biological process and in both cases, the consequent resumption of their female identities is rapidly followed by marital reunion with Posthumus and Orlando respectively. Perhaps this biological determinism is responsible for the nineteenth-century impression of Innogen's 'total femininity which she cannot effectively conceal under her male disguise.' 35 The patterns of sexuality that emerge in the course of Cymbeline do so through the mechanisms of dream. Innogen's femaleness, like that of Rosalind is biologically fixed however and even the dynamics of Shakespearean sexuality must submit to the exigencies of gender and human reproduction.

In V. v, Cymbeline offers us the most extended corollary of drama and dream. The descent of Jupiter is, in Warren's terms, one of the play's most obvious moments of 'theatrical virtuosity'. It is not a dream recollected in tranquillity, like Hermia's which is described for us after the event. Posthumus's dream, in all its magnificence, is played out in front of us, dramatised for us. Moreover, although the dream involves the dreamer's family and Jupiter, we are never allowed to forget that the whole episode is the product of Posthumus's own mentality. The device of the wooden-sounding fourteeners that prefix the descent of the god 'emphasise that Posthumus is dreaming.' 36 Peter Hall echoes this interpretation of the obsolete style of verse, urging his actors (in the 1988 National Theatre version) to speak the lines quickly and rhythmically to suggest 'the pace and cross-cutting of dreams'. 37 Posthumus's dream, which sets up the dramatic riddle for the final scene to solve, finally fuses the biology of generation with drama and dream. Posthumus, born without a family (as his name indicates), finds that the child is father of the man: 'Sleep, thou hast been a grandsire and begot / A father to me' (V. iv. 123 - 124). Shakespearean dramaturgy illustrates that the dream and the drama are similarly related and that while the dream is father of the drama, it is the drama that is the progenitor of the dream.

34 For the theatricalisation of this idea in Peter Hall's production, see Warren, Staging Shakespeare's Late Plays, p. 92.

37 Cited by Warren, Shakespeare's Late Plays, p. 78.
VI

Re(-)fusing the Sign

Linguistic Ambiguity and the Subversion of Patriarchy in Romeo and Juliet and The Two Gentlemen of Verona

I am eating fish and chips in Stratford-upon-Avon. To be precise, I am doing so while leaning upon a lock-gate at the point where the Stratford canal flows into the river Avon. Slightly to my left is the Royal Shakespeare Theatre where I have just attended a performance of The Tempest. Slightly to my right is the fish-and-chip shop.

Thus begins Terence Hawkes's irreverent and incisive book, one of the first examinations of the cultural construction of the Shakespearean canon, That Shakesheherian Rag - a title culled with adroit allusiveness from the name of a twenties jazz song that appears in Eliot's The Waste Land. Towards the end of the book, Hawkes draws a parallel between the activities of the post-structuralist critic and the jazz musician:

> what I propose [is] the sense of a text as a site, or an area of conflicting and often contradictory potential interpretations, no one or group of which can claim 'intrinsic' primacy or 'inherent' authority ... The abstract model I reach for is of course that of jazz music ... interpretation constitutes the art of the jazz musician. The same unservile principle seems to me to be appropriate to the critic's

---

In the course of this chapter, I would like to keep Hawkes's methodology in mind and to offer readings of Romeo and Juliet and The Two Gentlemen of Verona which may in themselves be not only 'conflicting and often contradictory', but which will aim to expose the way in which the texts themselves have been and continue (in performance) to be, predicated on such contrarieties.

Just along the road from Hawkes's fish and chip shop, between The Other Place and The Swan Theatres, is a pub. If you approach the pub from the direction of The Other Place, the sign will read 'The Black Swan'. If you approach it from the direction of The Swan Theatre, the sign reads 'The Dirty Duck'. Two signifiers, two signifieds - but only one sign. Perhaps we should agree with Claudio that 'there is no believing old signs' (Much Ado, III. ii. 37) or hold them in the kind of contempt with which Aaron refers to his enemies, 'ye alehouse painted signs!' (Titus Andronicus, IV. ii. 98). Queen Margaret dismisses them too in the fury of her self-denigration: 'make my image but an alehouse sign' (II Henry VI, III. ii. 81). But not so fast - later in the same play, Richard of York kills Somerset under the sign of the Castle pub:

So, lie thou there;
For underneath an alehouse' paltry sign,
The Castle in Saint Albans, Somerset
Hath made the wizard famous in his death.

(V. ii. 67)

---

4 Bill Alexander's The Taming of the Shrew (RSC, 1992) wittily alluded to the theatre's local. At the beginning of the production, Christopher Sly was thrown out of a pub called 'The Ugly Duckling' while we first met Petruchio outside the sign of 'The Swan'. The pub signs were flown in stage right and left respectively. They clearly symbolised the superiority of the play's hero to the play's drunk.
The prophecy, that the duke should 'shun castles; / Safer shall he be upon the sandy plains / Than where castles mounted stand' (I. iv. 67 - 69), has come ironically true and the truth is valorised by the sign. Shakespeare's attitude to signs then seems, even in this single play, to be ambiguous. The pub sign may be the extreme of Margaret's wrath, an absurd token, or it may display the secret truth of prophecy (albeit that Somerset expected to die outside a very different sort of castle than a public house). 5

How to make sense of our pub sign though? One sign, two meanings like so many of the pairs of Shakespearean twins - 'One face, one voice, one habit, and two persons! / A natural perspective, that is and is not' (Twelfth Night, V. i. 208 - 209). Of course, we can explain the transformation of the one into the other. The Stratford pub sign rehearses the fairy tale of the ugly duckling who is transmuted through the course of its growth into a beautiful swan. Shakespeare himself achieved just such an avian transformation. Near the beginning of his career in 1592, by which time he had composed only five plays (three parts of Henry VI, The Comedy of Errors, and Titus Andronicus), he was described in Robert Greene's A Groatsworth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance as:

an upstart crow, beautified with our feathers, that with his Tiger's heart wrapped in a player's hide, supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blank verse as the best of you; and, being an absolute Johannes fac totem, is in his own conceit the only Shake-scene in a country. 6

The pun on Shake-scene and the deliberate misquotation from III Henry VI (in which Queen Margaret is derided by the Duke of York, 'O Tiger's heart wrapp'd in a woman's hide!' I. iv. 137), which was published in the same year as Greene's bilious autobiography, makes clear that the target is Shakespeare. Our poet is then 'an upstart crow' - an actor, got up as a playwright, and by the sound of it he is not too bothered about lining his nest with the literary feathers of other playwrights. Shakespeare then is an ugly duckling; young, inexperienced and aesthetically repulsive. Yet, the force of Greene's anxiety seems excessive on such a fledgling talent, notwithstanding the norms of satiric language and the pressures of commercial rivalry. The implication of Greene's extreme 'paranoia' is that even this early, Shakespeare was preparing to stretch his wings.

5 For a similar ironic prophecy see the Jerusalem chamber at the end of II Henry IV, IV. v. 235, and of course Macbeth.

Seven years after Shakespeare's death, when the actors Heminge and Condell published the first folio of the plays, Ben Jonson wrote a commendatory poem in which he referred to the playwright as 'Sweet swan of Auon!' The image recalls that of the Shakespearean coat of arms on top of which a bird shakes a spear (thus onomastically performing the family name). Jonson's poem embeds the same pun when he notes that in each line of his plays, Shakespeare 'seemes to shake a Lance, / As brandish't at the eyes of Ignorance' (69 - 70). No longer an earthly sign, Shakespeare is apotheosised into a celestial constellation, a guiding star of dramatic creativity:

But stay, I see thee in the Hemisphere
Aduanc'd, and made a Constellation there!
Shine forth, thou Starre of Poets, and with rage,
Or influence, chide, or cheere the drooping Stage;
Which, since thy flight from hence, hath mourn'd like night,
And despaires day, but for thy Volumes light.

(75 - 81, my emphases)

---

Shakespeare, it seems, has flown to that great aviary in the sky occupied by Greene and all the other feathered playwrights, from whence, according to Jonson, he will write reviews of contemporary theatre!

Shakespeare's fairy tale transformation certainly helps contextualise the pub sign. (It also incidentally enlightens the name of The Swan Theatre.) But the transformation of the cygnet into the swan is unsatisfactory as a way of explaining the double presence of the (two-in-one) sign. It is after all, to pose a diachronic solution to a synchronic problem. Moreover, this diachronic explanation reinforces rather than challenges the mutual exclusivity of the two signifiers. Shakespeare becomes the swan at the expense of the duckling, in becoming the former, he sheds the ugly plumage of the latter. Our sign though is both duck and swan, swan and duck and neither takes precedence. Both are equally available, both are instantly present. In addition, our pub sign figures the simultaneous presence not merely of two different signifiers, but of two different signifieds, and its meaning is contingent upon the position of the viewer. If you have come from The Swan Theatre, you'll be drinking in The Dirty Duck; from The Other Place, The Black Swan. Like Hawkes's critical model then, the sign holds contraries in equilibrium, balancing alternative possibilities in dynamic reciprocity.

The actor is of course a site as well as a product of at least two major signifying practices - physical and verbal. Shakespeare is fully aware of the multivalency of dramatic signification, pointing up, in the case of Lavinia, the visual by silencing the verbal. With her hands lopped off and her tongue cut out, Lavinia becomes a walking sign - 'Thou map of woe, that thus dost talk in signs!' (Titus, III. ii. 12). Unable to speak, her physical movement becomes heightened as a signifying practice - a code which Titus claims to be able to read: 'Mark Marcus, mark! I understand her signs' (III. i. 143). The linguistic competence of the handless renders his own hand superfluous and, while his brother and son argue about which of them will sacrifice his own hand to save that of Titus, Lavinia's father requests help for the amputation of his own: 'Come hither, Aaron, I'll deceive them both; / Lend me thy hand, and I will give thee mine' (III. i. 187 - 188). In exchange for his hand, Titus has been promised the return of his two sons. Instead he receives their severed heads. His response is revealing. While Marcus and Lucius lament hyperbolically, Titus merely laughs; Lavinia, unable to speak, simply kisses her father. The language of the mutilated is the language of action, not words. To read Lavinia's aphonc signs is to speak them with her, not physically to speak, but to speak physically. Titus speaks a little of both languages but not enough to understand fully the machinations of Aaron nor the kiss of his daughter. As Titus implores his daughter to die, his brother Marcus tactlessly employs a figure of speech from the language of the dextrous, 'Teach her not thus to lay / Such violent hands upon her tender life' (III. ii. 21-22). Titus is quick to reprimand him, 'O, handle not the theme, to talk of hands, / Lest we remember still that we have none' (III. ii. 29 - 30). Uncle and niece no longer speak the same language. Titus speaks both and neither.

In its simultaneous presence of two different signs, our pub sign occupies the same middle ground as Titus between two discourses. Usually in Shakespeare's work, to speak across a discursive barrier is to come semantically unstuck. As Henry woos Kate at the end of Henry V, she remarks upon her double separation from him, 'O bon Dieu! les langues des hommes sont pleines de tromperies' (V. ii. 116). Alice translates for us in 'broken English' (l. 243), 'dat de tongeus o f de mans is be full o f deceits' (l. 120). Kate is isolated from the English King by her Frenchness and her femaleness. A similar example illustrating female ignorance of foreign languages occurs in William's Latin lesson in The Merry Wives of Windsor: 'Evans: I pray you have your rememberance, child. Accusativus: "hing, hang, hog". Mistress Quickly: "Hang-hog" is Latin for bacon, I warrant you' (IV. i. 41 - 44).
bad, but not as bad as that in which Mortimer and his new wife find themselves: 'This is the deadly spite that angers me: / My wife can speak no English, I no Welsh' (I Henry IV, III. i. 192 - 193). 9

As the three rebels bicker about the division of the kingdom in I Henry IV, Hotspur challenges his Welsh ally politically by mocking his linguistic competence. Hotspur wants the course of the River Trent straightened by explosives in order to enlarge his share of land. Glendower opposes him:

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{Hots:} & \quad \text{I'll have it so; a little charge will do it.} \\
\text{Glen:} & \quad \text{I'll not have it alt'ed.} \\
\text{Hots:} & \quad \text{Will not you?} \\
\text{Glen:} & \quad \text{No, nor you shall not.} \\
\text{Hots:} & \quad \text{Who shall say me nay?} \\
\text{Glen:} & \quad \text{Why, that will I.} \\
\text{Hots:} & \quad \text{Let me not understand you, then, speak it in Welsh.}
\end{align*} \\
(III. i. 114 - 120)
\]

Percy’s typical hotheaded contempt elicits the following defiant insistence from Glendower that his English is as good as that spoken at court:

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{I can speak English, lord, as well as you,} \\
\text{For I was train'd up in the English court;} \\
\text{Where, being but young, I framed to the harp} \\
\text{Many an English ditty lovely well,} \\
\text{And gave the tongue a helpful ornament -} \\
\text{A virtue that was never seen in you.}
\end{align*} \\
(III. i. 121 - 126)
\]

---

9 In her review of Medieval Welsh Erotic Poetry, edited by Dafydd Johnston, Elizabeth Archibald cites an amusing example of a similar linguistic barrier. In Tudur Penllyn’s mid-fifteenth century poem a conversation between a Welshman and an English woman takes place with verses in alternate languages. Although the woman claims that she cannot speak Welsh, she plainly knows what is going on: ‘Let my hand lift up your skirt / and feel you, fair merry girl. // I don’t speak Welsh, you Welshman, I stop it, leave me alone. (TLS, 3 April 1992.)
That Glendower's speech is as fluent as that of the court, is the proof that he is equipped linguistically and thus politically to attempt to overthrow it. With knowing irony though, the playwright has him protest his Englishness with phrasing that is stereotypically Welsh - 'lovely well'! Hotspur's casual submission of the piece of land implies that politically he takes his ally at his word: 'I do not care; I'll give thrice so much land / To any well-deserving friend' (ll. 137 -138).

Richard II offers another example of the interconnection between political and linguistic competence. Towards the end of the play, the Duchess of York pleads for the life of her son Aumerle, whose plot to betray the new king has just come to light. She implores Bolingbroke to say 'Pardon' to her son, 'The word is short, but not so short as sweet; / No word like "pardon" for kings' mouths so meet' (V. iii. 117 - 118). Aumerle's own father, York, places a higher value on loyalty to his sovereign than the life of his son and instructs Bolingbroke to render his pardon meaningless by proffering it in another language, 'Speak it in French, King, say "pardonne moy"' (l. 119). The Duchess responds ferociously:

Dost thou teach pardon pardon to destroy?
Ah, my sour husband, my hard-hearted lord,
That sets the word itself against the word!
Speak 'pardon' as 'tis current in our land;
The chopping French we do not understand.

(ll. 120 - 124, my emphases)

The linguistic anarchy, pardon destroying pardon, the word against the word, is the result of weak government. The corruption of Richard's court finds its voice in the slipperiness

---

10 Another example of satire against Welsh attempts to speak English is Falstaff's reference to Hugh as a 'Welsh goat ... one who makes fritters of English' (The Merry Wives, V. v. 136 - 142).
of language. In the very next scene, the imprisoned king enters, lamenting his inability to order his thoughts:

The better sort,
As thoughts of things divine, are intermix'd
With scruples, and do set the word itself
Against the word

(V. v. 11 - 14, my emphases)

This linguistic conflict results in a state of political aphasia. Words or signs struggle against each other and their internecine dissension makes all of them ultimately meaningless. Words 'have words' with other words. The correlation between linguistic ambiguity and political subversion is important for the following discussion of the plays specified in my title. It is a correlation noted by Terry Eagleton:

a stability of signs - each word securely in place, each signifier (mark or sound) corresponding to its signified (or meaning) - is an integral part of any social order: settled meanings, shared definitions and regularities of grammar both reflect, and help to constitute, a well-ordered political state. Yet it is all this which Shakespeare's flamboyant punning, troping and riddling threaten to put into question. 11

Our duck and swan are set against one another - if not face to face then certainly back to back - positioning themselves for a duel. Yet they are also united - there is only one pub. Paradoxically what separates them, joins them, and, as Hawkes tells us, we cannot expect to solve this discordia concors: we can only accept and acknowledge it. This is why the critic's position must eschew "intrinsic" primacy [and] "inherent" authority.

On their way to Capulet's party, Benvolio assures the love-sick Romeo that he will see women the like of whom will put the Rosaline's beauty to shame: 'Compare her face with some that I shall show, / And I will make thee think thy swan a crow' (I. ii. 86 - 87). Romeo is adamant in his adoration of Rosaline: 'I'll go along, no such sight to be shown, / But to rejoice in splendor of mine own' (ll. 100 - 101). When he sees the true swan, Juliet, Rosaline, the ugly duckling, is discarded. In choosing one sign over the other, Romeo precludes Hawkes's critical equivocality and thus refuses the hovering stasis that is the vantage point of the bird of prey.

II

This kind of debate about signs and signification runs throughout Romeo and Juliet and The Two Gentlemen of Verona. Both plays are about the reading and the writing of signs - about the question of interpretation - interpretation which is always a problem. The illiterate Peter in Romeo and Juliet assumes that the initiated can read everything. Of Romeo he enquires, 'I pray, can you read anything you see?' (I. ii. 60) Romeo responds with mischievous literalism 'Ay, if I know the letters and the language' (I. 61). Similarly in The Two Gentlemen of Verona, Launce 'proves' that Speed cannot read by arbitrarily misinterpreting him:

Laun: Fie on thee jolt-head; thou canst not read.
Spee: Thou liest; I can.
Laun: I will try thee. Tell me this: Who begot thee?
Spee: Marry, the son of my grandfather.

---

Allan Shickman notes a similar avian metamorphosis in George Chapman's All Fools wherein Rynaldo describes beauty as 'like a cousoning picture which one way / Shewes like a Crowe, another like a Swanne'. He suggests that both poets may have seen the same anamorphic picture. 'Turning Pictures in Shakespeare's England', Art Bulletin, 59 (1977), 67 - 70, p. 67. See also Jurgis Baltrušaitis, Anamorphic Art, translated by W. J. Strachan (Cambridge, 1977).
Interpretation depends, as with the pub sign, on which direction you are facing, on which language you are speaking, on which grandparent you are choosing and the relativity of reading and interpretation is something that these two plays continually insist upon. Even Gregory and Sampson's lewd humour of the first scene of Romeo and Juliet, which is the closest thing to badinage in this sexually dangerous world, is open to interpretation - 'take it in what sense thou wilt' (I. i. 26).

Despite this relativity, throughout Romeo and Juliet, the patriarchs attempt to impose a single interpretation on their world. Capulet is contemptuous of his daughter's 'chopt logic' (III. v. 149) while the friar admonishes Romeo for his crazed speechifying, threatening him with a bogus absolution unless the offence is spelt out: 'Be plain, good son, and homely in thy drift, / Ridling confession finds but riddling shrift' (II. iii. 55 - 56). But of all the patriarchal figures, it is the Prince who is most obviously culpable of transgressing Hawkes's indeterminacy. To him, an inquest is vital to apportion blame - 'Some shall be pardon'd and some punished' (V. iii. 307) - and uncertainty spells trouble:

Seal up the mouth of outrage for a while,
Till we can clear these ambiguities,
And know their spring, their head, their true descent;
And then will I be general of your woes,

---

13 Compare the Duchess of York's use of the adjective 'chopping' cited above.
And lead you, even to death.

(V. iii. 215 - 219, my emphases)

The Prince will once again stamp his version of the truth onto the truth, if necessary by setting the word against the word, to restore his rule - 'then will I be the generall of your woes'.

In the 1991 RSC production (directed by David Leveaux) this emphasis on patriarchy was brought out through the performance of Julian Glover as the Prince. Never has a production made more clear that the root of all problems is the aggressively pacific politic of Escalus. A towering presence, Glover was more martial and threatening than either the basically benevolent Capulet (who would allow the Montagues to stay at his party and prevents Tybalt breaking the peace), or the meek and marginal Montague. Glover's Escalus swept around the stage with the unarmed and unguarded authority of an absolute ruler and it was clear that the vehemence of the families' feud originated from his intransigence. The first sword fight was slowed right down to a frame-by-frame pace and, as blows were struck amid darkness and smoke, the images of civil strife were closer to the brutality of a history play than the usual sparring of the hot and volatile dog-days. In this Romeo there was little spontaneous violence erupting opportunistically to counter insults and jibes. Instead there was an ever-present atmosphere of blunt and brutish danger from which paradoxically the actual fighting was a welcome relief.

This was an extremely interesting and unusual interpretation of a play which has a tendency to find its own level of heat, sweat and passion. Jean Kalman's lighting was extremely bleak, shadowy, monochrome. Costumes were generally dark. The contrast between this sombre production and the more usual warmth of productions of this play can be seen in the contrast with Terry Hands's 1989 RSC production in The Swan (Cp Leveaux's production emphasised cold intelligence and manipulative strategies. His Romeo was less the tragedy of 'A pair of star-cross'd lovers' than an emphatic indictment of a ruler who divides his people with threats and savagery. Escalus never attempts to make the peace; instead, he continually laments that he has not been brutal enough in putting down the discord. The state is divided against itself. This was a political rather than a passionate production.

Alison Chitty brought out the political by setting the play in front of a series of screens on which were enlarged sections of various paintings by Renaissance masters (see plate I). The action seemed to be taking place in a Medici villa and the sliding of the shutters into different configurations with characters coming between and ducking behind them made the atmosphere all the more Machiavellian. In particular, she had chosen to enlarge those fragments of paintings that contained fingers and hands. Characters on stage were continually being pointed at, implicated and singled out. We were not so far from the treacherous intrigue of Hamlet.

The various fights of the tomb scene passed off in shadow, smoke and silhouette, again like something out of a history play. Escalus stepped in to claim the credit for the final cessation of the violence. The ease with which Capulet took Montague's hand implied that there was little of the fighting spirit left - if indeed there had ever really been any at all. The production ended with the stark re-emergence of the power of Escalus insisting that while 'Some shall be pardon'd' others will be punished. If the Apothecary, the Nurse or Lawrence are to be dealt the retribution of the state, they will have the satisfaction of knowing that it is their suffering that keeps Escalus in office. In eschewing the romanticised ending with a pair of mythologised lovers, Leveaux took us back pessimistically, irredeemably and irrevocably to the absolute power of the state. In his final stage-centre, rigid stance and unwavering pronouncements, Julian Glover's Escalus demonstrated that he was fit to occupy this position of power. Someone has to write history and, as Nineteen Eighty Four makes plain, they that control the past control the future. There is only room in Verona for one Big Brother. Simon Trussler invokes the parallel futurist fantasy in his description of the difficulties of communication in the play when he describes Romeo and Juliet as 'this brave new world of words.'

Keir Elam has soundly demonstrated the fact that the Shakespearean comedies are, as Ernst Cassirer puts it, built upon the 'game of the pure self-activity of the word'. In this sense, the patriarchs of Romeo and Juliet are at odds with the comic spirit that underlies these early plays and that underpins the rejection (in line with Hawkes's plurality) of a single dogmatic critical stance. Romeo and Juliet, albeit a tragedy, is itself keen to expose the fault of adopting a definite position in relation to the signifying practices that inhere in its world, for Romeo and Juliet is profoundly opposed to authority both in the political sense and the literary sense (auctoritee). Moreover, parts of the play (notably those surrounding the persona of Mercutio) seem resistant to and subversive of the heterosexist authority upon which the patriarchy of Verona is predicated. In particular, Mercutio's opposition to the Verona he sees around him is marked in his almost plethorically sexualised word play. In this role, Mercutio performs what Jonathan Dollimore has recently termed 'transgressive reinscription'. Dollimore defines this as 14 Programme note for 1989 RSC production, p. XIV. The title of Huxley's novel is of course dialogically engaged with The Tempest.

---

a mode of transgression which seeks not an escape from existing structures but rather a subversive reinscription within them, and in the process their dislocation or displacement.

Furthermore, Dollimore mentions exactly those features which characterise Mercutio when he points out that 'irony and ambiguity tend to be intrinsic to transgressive reinscription'.

The analogy between linguistic and political order noted by Eagleton above is here overlaid by issues of gender and sexuality. In one respect, ambiguous language is always sexually suspect. As Viola puts it, 'they that dally nicely with words may quickly make them wanton' (Twelfth Night, III. i. 13). Patricia Parker notes with respect to the heroine's extended disguise that 'Viola crosses the boundaries of social and sexual place or identity; but the idea of metaphor itself as 'clothing' includes the possibility of a linguistic transvestitism [sic]. Subversive rhetorical strategies are inseparable from sexual transgression.

M. M. Mahood begins her discussion of Romeo and Juliet by pointing out baldly that it 'is one of Shakespeare's most punning plays'. The sexual nature of this punning is obvious from the very first scene which, in Richard Wilson's phrase, is 'an orgy of blue jokes'.

---

18 Ibid., p. 292.
19 Dally of course has a specifically sexual charge in the plays of Shakespeare. Compare 'dallying with a brace of courtesans', Richard III (III. vii. 74) and the 'primrose path of dalliance', Hamlet (I. iii. 50).
'My naked weapon is out', roars one brute, and the most famous of all love stories begins with a belly laugh about rape, murder and the size of penises.

There is a marked contrast between the mythology of the play as a story of romantic love and the 'brutality of male dominance expressed in sadistic quibbles.' These quibbles, as Wilson and Mahood suggest, involve the association of violence and sexuality. The substitution of swords and daggers for the phallus occurs throughout. This association was particularly pronounced in the 1989 RSC production directed by Terry Hands:

Lolling on the ground in the hot Italian sun, [Sampson and Gregory's] puerile phallicism was accompanied by gesticulating with and fondling the tips of their swords - Draw thy tool. The production was full of the fantasies of adolescent boys, self-appointed studs, over-eager to assert manhood both in terms of maturity and potency. Vincent Regan's Tybalt entered with swords strapped round his waist and across his torso - a swaggering Rambo. The other young bucks brandished and consistently polished daggers and swords.

In his fascinating history of swearing, Geoffrey Hughes notes that the vocabulary of phallicism and intercourse is often of a violent nature. He cites the slang terms for sexual intercourse, bang, knock, and the recently fashionable bonk. The metaphors for 'penis' are no less suggestive: tool, prick, chopper and weapon, the last of which ... goes right back to Anglo-Saxon.

Of these words, Romeo and Juliet uses tool (I. i. 37), weapon (I. i. 39, l. 94, II. iv. 166, and III. i. 89), and prick (I. iv. 26, l. 28, and II. iv. 119). Simon Trussler notes the 23 Shakespeare's Wordplay, p. 60.

---

phallicism of weaponry in the play especially in the case of Mercutio. Of the sword, he writes:

Such a brazenly phallic substitute well suits Mercutio, whose sexuality is as much in his head, stuffed as it is with bawdy puns and images, as it is at the point of a sword. 26

Male society in the play enjoys language games, setting the word against the word at the expense of women. The violence implicit in the armament of phallicism is symptomatic of the subjugation of the female throughout. Julia Kristeva writes:

Under the guise of sex, it is hatred that prevails, and that comes out most obviously in the very first pages of the text. In the first scene, the two servants' remarks, peppered with puns and obscenities, cause the darkness of sex and inversions of all sorts to hang over this presumably pure romance. 27

The homosocial bonding is cemented by a series of language games that erode the categorical distinctions of homoerotic and heterosexual.

As Mercutio, Benvolio and Romeo make their way to Capulet's feast, the love-sick Romeo staggers through a series of self-indulgent puns. He will bear the light since his mood is heavy, he has a soul of lead while the others are suited to dancing because they have light soles. He is too sorely wounded with Love's arrow to soar with Cupid's wing, too bound to the earth to bound upwards. Mercutio's reaction is to puncture this overearnest love lamentation with puns about masturbation, 'If love be rough with you, be rough with love; / Prick love for pricking, and you beat love down' (I. iv. 28). Gibbons

26 Programme note, p. XVII.
notes squemishly in his Arden edition. The sense of beat love down includes "causing sexual detumescence". The humour then becomes scatological:

\[\begin{align*}
\text{Rome:} & \quad \text{The game was ne'er so fair, and I am done.} \\
\text{Merc:} & \quad \text{Tut, dun's the mouse, the constable's own word.} \\
& \quad \text{If thou art dun, we'll draw thee from the mire} \\
& \quad \text{Of - save your reverence - love, wherein thou stickest} \\ & \quad \text{Up to the ears.}
\end{align*}\]

(Arden edition, I. iv. 39 - 43)

Gibbons explains, 'The gist of Mercutio's reply is that Romeo is dull and heavy as if he were a bogged cart-horse, that being in love is like being up to the ears in ordure ... and he must be freed from the misery by dancing.' Mercutio's humour is extreme in its anality. 'Save your reverence' is obviously a euphemism for the ordure that Gibbons mentions (or more likely another word for the same), but it is worth noting that the \textit{OED} defines \textit{sir-reverence} as 'human excrement [or] a piece or lump of this'. In the light of this, it may be appropriate to suggest that there is an aural association between \textit{ears} and \textit{arse}.

Mercutio's phallicism is noted by Joseph A. Porter who calls him 'easily, in terms of what he talks about, Shakespeare's most phallic character.' Mercutio's bawdy represents the highpoint of masculinist repartee. As he and Benvolio seek the missing Romeo, who is at that moment under the balcony of Juliet, Mercutio allows his sexual innuendos to run riot:

\begin{footnotes}
\item[29] \textit{Ibid.}, p. 108.
\item[30] The \textit{OED} cites an example from Greene of 1592, about three years before the composition of \textit{Romeo and Juliet}.
\end{footnotes}
Merc: I conjure thee by Rosaline's bright eyes,
By her high forehead and her scarlet lip,
By her fine foot, straight leg, and quivering thigh,
And the demesnes that there adjacent lie,
That in thy likeness thou appear to us.

Benv: An if he hear thee, thou wilt anger him.

Merc: This cannot anger him: 'twould anger him
To raise a spirit in his mistress' circle
Of some strange nature, letting it there stand
Till she had laid it and conjur'd it down;
That were some spite. My invocation
Is faire and honest: in his mistress' name,
I conjure only but to raise up him.

(II. i. 17 - 29)

In the 1991 RSC production, Tim McInnerny's Mercutio was sitting on the ground next to Benvolio. As he got to the line about Rosaline's demesnes, he thrust his forearm between the legs of the seated Benvolio and fist-fucked the air. Porter writes of the passage, ascribing to Mercutio a rather less violent character than this gesture implied:

Mercutio here exhibits an attitude toward Romeo's phallus that is at once generous and interested. It is as if Mercutio has a personal investment, as we say, in his friend's erection. The nature of the investment might seem ... to involve the idea of Mercutio's taking Rosaline's place not only as conjurer but also as container of Romeo's phallus, and it is true that Rosaline has receded from active participation with the stranger, her circle round his spirit, to a mere deputizing name at Mercutio's raising of Romeo. 32

Mercutio's phallocentricity continues in his description of an intercourse that vacillates between a fruit, suggestive of female pudenda, and sodomy:

Now will he sit under a medlar tree
And wish his mistress were that kind of fruit
As maids call medlars when they laugh alone.
O Romeo, that she were, O that she were
An open-arse and thou a poperin pear!

(Arden edition, II. i. 34 - 38)

32 Ibid., p. 157.
Gibbons notes that the medlar was 'thought to resemble the female genitalia with an additional quibble on medlar / meddler (meddle = 'to have sexual intercourse with'):

OED v 5.

Q1, which prints 'open Et cetera' instead of 'open ars' is glossed by Eric Partridge as follows:

the pun on medlar, slangily known as 'an open-arse', and poperin pear, shape-resembling penis and scrotum, is so forcibly obvious that 'an open et-caetera' must here mean 'an open arse'. Yet my interpretation of Shakespeare's 'open et-caetera' as 'pudend' is correct, for the opening clearly refers to the female cleft, not to the human anus. With the human bottom regarded as involving and connoting the primary sexual area, compare the slangy use of tail for the human bottom in general and for the female pudend in particular. 'Open et-caetera' therefore suggests 'open cunt' - admissive organ - desirous girl.

I cite this entry at length in order to demonstrate that within the joke is the possibility of both hetero- and homosexual intercourse. Mercutio's priapic sexuality defies the easily categorical. He is the sexual analogue of our indeterminate sign refusing to be read one way or the other.

Romeo's conversion from a narcissistic lover to a witty comrade for Mercutio, is marked by a shift in his word play. Mercutio weans Romeo off the cloying and stale formulae of the languishing lover to a repartee that is mercurial and light. Mercutio notes the change of mood and rhetoric of his friend:

---

33 Arden edition, p. 126. Gibbons's note is reinforced by recent stage practice. In Trevor Nunn's Measure for Measure (RSC, 1991), Lucio (played by Roger Hyams) grasped his genitals and shook his head disapprovingly when he noted that, having got 'a wench with child', he had nearly been forced to marry 'the rotten medlar' (V. iii. 165 - 169). The gesture implied that the woman was diseased (the whole production emphasised a prevailing venereal unhealth) and so medlar translates quite literally here as 'cunt'. Later in the same production, when Lucio told the Duke, 'I know him; 'tis a meddling friar' (V. i. 127), the word 'meddling' was accompanied with a salacious gesture.

Why, is not this better now than groaning for love? Now art thou sociable, now art thou Romeo; now art thou what thou art by art as well as by nature; for this drivelling love is like a great natural that runs lolling up and down to hide his bauble in a hole.

(II. iv. 85 - 89)

Romeo has now returned to Mercutio's ideal of him in a way that suggests that his previous melancholy was mere affectation - 'now art thou Romeo'. Mercutio attacks the heterosexual relationship by remarking that at its best, it is unsatisfying and banal. Intercourse is the mere hiding of a 'bauble in a hole'!

This opinion of intercourse offers the play's audience an unresolved ambiguity. For if we share Mercutio's cynical attitude towards physical love, we are nonetheless hard pressed to dismiss the passionate rhetoric of the lovers as they celebrate it later in the play. On the other hand, Mercutio's charm and wit and his ability to evoke such qualities in those around him (notably, as here, Romeo) make him a popular figure with audiences. Dryden suggested as early as 1672 that Mercutio's attractiveness threatens to take over the play so much so that Shakespeare 'was forc'd to kill him in the third Act to prevent being killed by him.' As R. L. Smallwood puts it, 'His wit and gaiety make him an immediately vivid focus of audience affection; so long as Mercutio remains in the play we are protected from being overwhelmed by the obsessive passion of the lovers.' Of Mercutio's punning exit line - 'ask for me to-morrow, and you shall find me a grave man' (III. i. 94) - Smallwood writes, 'Mercutio leaves the play, as he has existed throughout it, in devastating verbal command.' With this, Mahood concurs, 'Mercutio dies with a quibble that asserts his vitality in the teeth of death.' Surely this is to underestimate the

37 Ibid., p. 60.
38 Mahood, Shakespeare's Wordplay, p. 69.
Veronica Smart as Ophelia and Daniel Webb as Hamlet.
B. Dutch Engraving of Elizabeth as Europa.
D. Saltcellar by Cellini.
Kevin Costello as Leontes with the statue of Hermione.

Cymbeline

by William Shakespeare
Michael Maloney as Romeo (foreground) and Kevin Doyle as Benvolio.
Romeo and Juliet, dir. Terry Hands, RSC, 1989.
L to R: Patrick Brennan (Benvolio),
Mark Rylance (Romeo), David O'Hara (Mercutio).
Clare Holman as Juliet and Michael Maloney as Romeo. Notice the set (designed by Alison Chitty) made up of panels in the style of Italian Renaissance painting, one of which forms the downstage elevation of Juliet’s balcony.
J. The Merchant of Venice, dir. Peter Hall, 1989.
L to R in foreground: Leigh Lawson (Antonio), Geraldine James (Portia), Dustin Hoffman (Shylock).
John Carlile as Ferneze and Alun Armstrong as Barabas.
N. As You Like It, dir. Declan Donnellan, Cheek by Jowl, 1991.
Adrian Lester as Rosalind and Patrick Toomey as Orlando.
O. Troilus and Cressida, dir. Sam Mendes, RSC, 1990.
Norman Rodway as Pandarus and Sally Dexter as Helen.
Discover the world of Longman literature dramatic effect of removing the play's main source of verbal trickery on the tone of the rest of the play. Smallwood himself notes earlier that 'the death of the principal comic character ... Mercutio, comes as a horrifying shock, unexpected, accidental, turning the play in a tragic direction from which it can never be recalled.' This seems a much more accurate account in the light of which Mercutio's exit line is not simply another joke, but the final desperate and ironic demonstration of the inability of verbal adroitness to deal with the brutal world of Verona. With Mercutio gone, the play darkens considerably in tone. Verbal quibbles and the subversive strategies that they voice, completely dry up.

The situation in The Two Gentlemen of Verona is similar in respect of the play's interest in the difficulties of interpretation and the manner in which this is articulated through verbal juggling. Despite the marked difference in tone, the play has about it the seriousness of Romeo and Juliet in relation to the relativity of meaning and signification. The jokes in The Two Gentlemen of Verona range from the simple, based on aural similarities, to the complex, involving shifting connotation. The following is a typical example of both:

Spee: How now, Signior Launce! What news with your mastership?

Laun: With my master's ship? Why, it is at sea.

Spee: Well, your old vice still: mistake the word. What news then, in your paper?

Laun: The black'st news that ever thou heard'st.

Spee: Why, man? how black?

Laun: Why, as black as ink.

(III. i. 276 - 283)

---

39 Smallwood, 'Tis Pity She's a Whore and Romeo and Juliet, p. 52.
The quibble on ship has occurred near the outset of the play when Proteus and Speed slide the word across another, sheep. The joke on 'black'st newes' depends upon the literalisation of the colour's connotative properties. Speed assumes that a black letter is a letter that contains dark or foreboding news. Launce simply means that it is written in black ink! Throughout the play, characters 'mistake the word' and this calculated misapprehension, though lacking the sexual obsessiveness of the word play of Romeo and Juliet, points up the difficulties of interpersonal communication. Moreover, there is, in The Two Gentlemen of Verona, an insistence about the jesting which is close to that of the self-consciousness of Romeo rather than the verbal intelligence of Mercutio. As Camille Slights puts it:

Their linguistic ingenuity is not the effortless command of language that expresses unselfconscious ease and assurance in a social situation but rather the ostentatious display of wit that indicates vulnerability and insecurity.

Next to the relaxed jocoseness of Mercutio, their showing off betrays a certain inexperience and immaturity.

The Two Gentlemen of Verona is similar to Romeo and Juliet in its growing movement away from the harmless comedy of words to the increasing awareness of the potential dangers of language. In the notorious attempted rape scene, Proteus makes it clear that there is another, more malevolent aspect to the sparkle of verbal wooing. The sexual desire that such language articulates can be rather less savoury:

---

40 For another instance of the ship/sheep quibble, see Love's Labour's Lost, II. i. 218f.

Nay, if the gentle spirit of moving words
Can no way change you to a milder form,
I'll woo you like a soldier, at arms' end,
And love you 'gainst the nature of love - force ye.

(V. iv. 54 - 57)

Force is the final weapon of a wooer who is linguistically exhausted, yet it arises paradoxically as the successor to 'the force of heaven-bred poesy' (III. ii. 72). In accordance with the text's Renaissance misogyny, the rape is seen to be an extreme but entirely contiguous outcome of the earlier linguistic violence and is causally related to it. The intensity of this attack ironically echoes Julia's earlier insistence (which itself articulates the popular misogynist myth) that 'girls who say no really mean yes':

What fool is she, that knows I am a maid
And would not force the letter to my view!
Since maids, in modesty, say 'No' to that
Which they would have the profferer construe 'Ay'.

(I. ii. 53 - 56, my emphasis) 42

Moreover, Julia is not the only one to espouse such a belief in the 'cussedness' of women. As Valentine instructs the Duke in his wooing of the fictional lady, he remarks upon what he takes to be this female perversity:

A woman sometime scorns what best contents her.
Send her another [present]; never give her o'er,
For scorn at first makes after-love the more.
If she do frown, 'tis not in hate of you,
But rather to beget more love in you;
If she do chide, 'tis not to have you gone,
For why the fools are mad if left alone.

42 For a terrifying restatement of this myth note Judge David Wild's summing up at a rape trial in 1986: 'Women who say no do not always mean no. It is not just a question of saying no. It is a question of how she says it, how she shows it and makes it clear. If she doesn't want it, she only has to keep her legs shut and there would be marks of force being used.' (Cited by Marion Wynne-Davies, "The Swallowing Womb": Consumed and Consuming Women in Titus Andronicus', in The Matter of Difference: Materialist Feminist Criticism of Shakespeare, edited by Valerie Wayne (London, 1991), 129 - 151, p. 129.)
Take no repulse, whatever she doth say;
For, 'Get you gone' she doth not mean 'Away!'
(III. i. 93 - 101)

In the light of this kind of reversal, the text, in the most disturbing manner, attempts to exculpate Proteus from blame for the attempted rape of Silvia. Her refusal is thus contextualised as a part of the coquettish armoury of every woman who, according to the play's oppressive ideology articulated by Valentine, Proteus, and even Julia, deny that which they really want. (When David Thacker directed the play for the RSC in 1991, Richard Bonneville played Valentine. His charming performance rendered Valentine as gauche and naïve and this speech worked therefore as a satire on male prejudice.)

The inverse scenario, which makes just as plain the equivocation of speakers is that in which characters ask for something they would rather be denied. As Julia woos Silvia in the guise of Sebastian, she voices her bewilderment at the self-contradictory mission in which she is engaged:

And now am I, unhappy messenger,
To plead for that which I would not obtain;
To carry that which I would have refus'd,
To praise his faith, which I would have disprais'd.
I am my master's true confirmed love,
But cannot be true servant to my master
Unless I prove false traitor to myself,
Yet will I woo for him, but yet so coldly,
As, heaven it knows, I would not have him speed.
(IV. iv. 95 - 103)

The frequency of the repetition of the first person pronoun (eight times in nine lines) makes explicit the personal nature of the frustration, and this contrasts pointedly with the 43 See for two important instances of equivocation, Hamlet, V. i. 149 and the porter scene in Macbeth. Compare note 5 above.

---

generality of the previous aphorisms, the most proverbial of which must be Valentine's woefully dangerous formulation, 'That man that hath a tongue, I say, is no man, / If with his tongue he cannot win a woman' (III. i. 104 - 105).

Repeatedly then these plays examine and emphasise the slippage between sign and referent. Language seems to be out of step with the world. In places, this is the cause of humour, in others, it is the source of danger and death. As Romeo and Juliet moves towards its double suicide and as The Two Gentlemen of Verona moves towards rape, so the fun of language fast evaporates. In Romeo and Juliet the 'flowery' language is literally cut down by death:

O son, the night before thy wedding day
Hath Death lain with thy wife. There she lies,
Flower as she was, deflowered by him.

(IV. v.35 - 37)

In raping Juliet, Death performs the same act as that attempted by Proteus on Silvia. Language surrenders its polysemic multivalence to the final transcendental signifieds of death or assault. As with Lavinia, physicality replaces speech.

III

While speaking attempts to evade the fixture of a single positionality (and in this it is successful in the earlier parts of the plays at least), it is not the only form of communicative act. Both Romeo and Juliet and The Two Gentlemen of Verona are concerned to demonstrate the relative freedom of speaking by contrasting it particularly with written communication. Books figure largely in Romeo and Juliet and they are usually the object of the play's moral scorn. They symbolise the impoverishment of a single viewpoint (what Hawkes called "intrinsic" primacy or "inherent" authority). When Mercutio denigrates Tybalt, he notes that he is 'A braggart, a rogue, a villain, that fights by the book of arithmetic' (III. i. 98). Juliet remarks upon Romeo's endearing inexperience in matters sexual which renders his kissing technically perfect though lacking improvisation, 'You kiss by th' book' (I. v. 108). Having slain him, Romeo fatally addresses the corpse of Paris on their sealed doom, 'O, give me thy hand, / One writ with me in sour misfortune's book!' (V. iii. 81 - 82). The book represents the kind of certitude against which are set the protean qualities of speaking and the vibrant pluralities of emotional contact. The whole point about Romeo's love for Juliet is that it is beyond prediction or pronouncement; it is richer than its prescription (in the literal sense of being 'pre-written') could ever allow. In the light of the special contempt reserved for the book, it is appropriate that the callow immaturity of Paris be described as one, despite the fact that Lady Capulet is here attempting to convince her daughter of the suitor's worth:

Read o'er the volume of young Paris' face,
And find delight writ there with beauty's pen;
Examine every married lineament,
And see how one another lends content;
And what obscur'd in this fair volume lies
Find written in the margent of his eyes.
This precious book of love, this unbound lover,
To beautify him, only lacks a cover....
That book in many's eyes doth share the glory
That in gold clasps locks in the golden story.

(I. iii. 82 - 93)

Juliet speaks of Romeo as a book only once - at the moment of her most vehement anger towards him, when the Nurse tells her that her husband has killed her cousin: 'Was ever book containing such vile matter / So fairly bound?' (III. ii. 83 - 84).
In its suspicion of the delimitation of the written word over the play of speech The Two Gentlemen of Verona is at one with Romeo and Juliet. As the two gentlemen take their leave of each other in the opening scene, Valentine sends up the pretentious love talk of his friend, asking him if he will pray 'on a love-book ... for my success?' (I. i. 19). Proteus responds, 'Upon some book I love I'll pray for thee' (I. 20). Frederick Kiefer notes, 'The expression love-book anticipates the conjunction of love with reading and writing that characterizes the entire play.' Letters, rather than books, function in The Two Gentlemen of Verona as symbols of an over-prescriptive authority.

Letters do seem to be everywhere in The Two Gentlemen of Verona. Speed carries Proteus's letter to Julia with which we see her toying in the second scene. Proteus holds back Julia's letter from his father claiming that it is from Valentine. Valentine writes Silvia a letter which she then gives to him. The arrival of Proteus is anticipated by a letter to the Duke (II. iv. 47) who later discovers Valentine's letter to Silvia detailing the arrangements for their imminent elopement. Proteus assures Valentine that though the latter is banished, 'Thy letters may be here, though thou art hence' (III. i. 247). Launce's 'cate-log' (III. i. 273) of his mistress's qualities is a parody of these letters while being another example of one. Sebastian delivers the letters of Proteus to Silvia and at the crucial moment of delivery produces the wrong paper which, with tragic irony is likely to be the one from Proteus that we saw her (as Julia) tear and reconstruct in the second scene of the play. The Two Gentlemen of Verona has as many letters as Antony and Cleopatra has messengers. No other play has so many lines on the delivery and reception of love letters and no other play (with the possible exception of Love's Labour's Lost) is so roundly distrustful of the language of love.

---

As Julia leaves Proteus, for the last time before he betrays her, she goes without a word and Proteus comes nearer to speaking the truth here than anywhere else in the play:

Julia, farewell! [Exit Julia]

What, gone without a word?
Ay, so true love should do: it cannot speak;
For truth hath better deeds than words to grace it....
Alas! this parting strikes poor lovers dumb.

(II. ii. 16 - 21)

Julia's emotional commitment is signalled here by her speechlessness. Like Cordelia, she prefers to 'Love, and be silent' (I. i. 61). In this world of linguistic duplicity, her silence is what informs the audience (though significantly not Proteus) of her strength of feeling. Later in the play, Speed supplies an adroit gloss on the hyperbole of the inflated love talk of conventional compliment:

Vale: Madam and mistress, a thousand good morrows.
Spec: [aside] Oh, 'give ye good-ev'n!
Here's a million of manners.
Silv: Sir Valentine and servant, to you two thousand.
Spec: [aside] He should give her interest, and she gives it him.

(II. i. 87 - 91)

The hard material edge of Speed's asides implies that there are discourses that are altogether more real than those of love - notably those of money and materiality. The conventional signs of love are attacked by both plays.

These conventions are of course those of Petrarchanism. As we have seen, Mercutio mercilessly sends up Romeo's self-dramatising hyperbole, suggesting with lewd double entendre that in becoming a lover, Romeo has lost part of his virility:
Social Shakespeare: VI

Benv: Here comes Romeo, here comes Romeo.
Merc: Without his roe, like a dried herring. O flesh, flesh, how art thou fishified! Now is he for the numbers that Petrarch flow'd in.

(II. iv. 36 - 39)

Romeo's roe, which the OED defines as 'the milt or sperm of a male fish' (citing just this extract as an example), has, Mercutio wryly implies, been wrung out of him by his assignation with Juliet. 45 Romeo is now good for nothing but to write Petrarchan poetry, which takes as its central tenet the unlikelihood of sexual contact. Petrarchanism, Mercutio suggests, is essentially impotent.

In their shared plight as hopeless Petrarchan lovers, Romeo and Proteus are strikingly similar - first Romeo:

O brawling love! O loving hate!
O anything, of nothing first create!
O heavy lightness! serious vanity!
Mis-shapen chaos of well-seeming forms!
Feather of lead, bright smoke, cold fire, sick health!
Still-waking sleep, that is not what it is!
This love feel I, that feel no love in this.

(I. i. 174 - 180)

Now Proteus (occurring similarly in the first scene):

To be in love - where scorn is bought with groans,
Coy looks with heart-sore sighs, one fading moment's mirth
With twenty watchful, weary, tedious nights;
If haply won, perhaps a hapless gain;
If lost, why then a grievous labour won;
However, but a folly bought with wit,
Or else a wit by folly vanquished.

(I. i. 29 - 35)

45 For another example of male impotence and its association with desiccation, see Macbeth, I. iii. 18, and my discussion of the topic with reference to Antony and Cleopatra in chapter IV.
The 1590s saw a burgeoning in the cycles of Petrarchan poetry and sonnet sequences. The effect of the sonnet on Romeo and Juliet has itself often been remarked (note the presence of two sonnets to introduce the first two acts), but we should also note its presence in The Two Gentlemen of Verona. For example, the only letter to be read out in its entirety is that of Valentine to Silvia (III. i. 140 - 149). As Kurt Schlueter notes in his New Cambridge edition, 'The lines approach the form of the Shakespearean sonnet, shortened by one quatrain.'

In their saturation in these conventions of love-speak, the plays illustrate the fierce paradox of Petrarchanism itself - that the chaos of emotional enrapture is distinctly at odds with the highly sophisticated and disciplined poetic strategies demanded by the genre. Such an artificial poetry is deeply suspicious. Proteus's advice to the dull Turio to acquire some of these poems, is sinister in its association of wooing and entrapment:

```
You must lay lime to tangle her desires
By waleful sonnets, whose composed rhymes
Should be full-fraught with serviceable vows.
```

(III. ii. 68 - 70)

Even Turio knows the force of the sonnet and arms himself in accordance with Proteus's advice with 'a sonnet that will serve the turn' (III. ii. 93). The very sonnet form protests its own permanence and immortality. It is though, as scholars of Shakespeare's own sonnets know to their bitter cost, one of the most enigmatic and elusive of poetic media, obscurring behind types and conventionalities, the individuals and specificities of particular relationships.

---

In the face of this male preoccupation with the 'correct' formulae of love, Julia, Silvia, and Juliet, with the mental and emotional agility that will characterise Shakespeare's later romantic women, reject the empty conventions of expression. We have already seen Julia take her leave of Proteus in a silence that says more than his protesting could ever do. Silvia is the only one of the four lovers not to write or receive a letter; instead, in a gesture which itself questions the uniqueness of such letters, she gets Valentine to write his own. His lines she finds stilted and artificial, noting that they are 'very clerkly done' (II. i. 97). She maintains that she 'would have had them writ more movingly' (I. 117). To borrow a phrase from Juliet, these men write 'by th' book'.

For Proteus, Valentine and Romeo, love is first and foremost the correct emulation of a model of behaviour and expression, and this model is a literary one. It is not that these lovers are merely aping or simulating these conventions - there may be nothing counterfeit about their feelings. It is simply that, in expressing their hyperbolic surrender to the emotion of love, they are misdirecting the energies of their commitment, besotted by a linguistic code rather than moving towards a real woman. In the sense that Shakespeare exposes the naivety of their situations, both plays are implied criticisms of the Petrarchan conventions. As Touchstone says, 'the truest poetry is the most feigning' (As You Like It, III. iii. 16).

---

48 Compare with Rosalind's pragmatic words to Orlando, 'men have died from time to time, and worms have eaten them, but not for love' (As You Like It, IV. i. 108). Orlando is of course a Petrarchan sonneteer.
The reason for rejecting the convention is made graphically clear by Proteus's 'hateful siege / Of contraries'. At the opening of II. vi, he weighs in the balance his betrayal of Julia and Valentine with the prospect of winning Silvia:

To leave my Julia, shall I be forsworn;
To love fair Silvia, shall I be forsworn;
To wrong my friend, I shall be much forsworn.
And ev'n that pow'r which gave me first my oath
Provokes me to this threefold perjury:
Love bade me swear, and Love bids me forswear.
O sweet-suggesting Love, if thou hast sinn'd,
Teach me, thy tempted subject, to excuse it!
At first I did adore a twinkling star,
But now I worship a celestial sun.
Unheedful vows may heedfully be broken;
And he wants wit, that wants resolved will
To learn his wit, t' exchange the bad for better.

(II. vi. 1 - 13)

In the very next scene, Julia makes tragically clear the mistake of taking Proteus at his word:

truer stars did govern Proteus' birth;
His words are bonds, his oaths are oracles,
His love sincere, his thoughts immaculate,
His tears pure messengers sent from his heart,
His heart as far from fraud as heaven from earth.

(II. vii. 74 - 78)

Faced with this duplicity, we might concede to Juliet's Nurse that 'There's no trust, / No faith, no honesty in men; all perjur'd, / All forsworn, all naught, all dissemblers' (III. ii. 85 - 87). In her conversion of Romeo from a Protean youth to a steadfast lover, however, Juliet proves the Nurse wrong. The moment at which this occurs is in Romeo's voluntary abnegation of the hackneyed and threadbare discourse of poetic love. Standing under her balcony, Romeo makes to inscribe his new girlfriend within what he takes to be the fealty of linguistic oath:

\[ \textit{Rome:} \quad \text{Lady, by yonder blessed moon I vow,} \\
\text{That tips with silver all these fruit-tree tops -} \\
\textit{Juli:} \quad \text{O, swear not by the moon, th' inconstant moon,} \\
\text{That monthly changes in her circled orb,} \\
\text{Lest that thy love prove likewise variable.} \\
\textit{Rome:} \quad \text{What shall I swear by?} \\ \textit{Juli:} \quad \text{Do not swear at all.} \\
\text{(II. ii. 107 -112)} \]

Romeo protests too much and Juliet has a healthy mistrust of Petrarchanism. The refusal to allow Romeo to swear separates his feelings for the first time in the play from the masculine discourse of explicit commitment and protestation. Moreover, in her refusal to allow Romeo the comfort of verbal certainty, Juliet like Mercutio refutes the explicit taxonomies of gendered relationships. Theirs happens to be a heterosexual relationship rather than being essentially defined as such by any criteria, social or artistic, extrinsic to it. It is thus held together by love, rather than oaths or sonnets.

The most important single thing about Petrarchanism, implicit in Mercutio's association of the convention with impotence, is that it celebrates a relationship which is inherently impossible.

\[ \text{My Love is of a birth as rare} \\
\text{As 'tis for object strange and high:} \\
\text{It was begotten by despair} \\
\text{Upon Impossibility.}^{5}\]

---

\[^{5}\text{The Poems of Andrew Marvell, edited by Hugh MacDonald (London, 1956), first published 1952, p. 34.} \]
The irony of this opening stanza from Marvell's 'The Definition of Love' is the presence of the verb begotten for the whole point of Petrarchan love is that it is never consummated. In the case of Romeo and Juliet, the love that was unattainable, Rosaline, fulfilled Romeo's requirement for a Petrarchan mistress. The fatal thing about the affair with Juliet and the way in which their relationship transgresses the Petrarchan boundaries, is in its consummation.

The second balcony scene (III. v) takes place on the morning after the couple have slept together for the first time. Juliet is now the quibbling double speaker of love, the deliberate misreader of signs. Once again the confusion is over types of bird; Juliet assures Romeo that 'It was the nightingale, and not the lark, / That pierc'd the fearful hollow of thine ear' (III. v. 2 - 3). No longer subscribing to the self-conscious display of quibbling love talk, Romeo recognises the dangers that await in the outside world, and the patriarchal determinism of the political realities of Verona comes crashing through the love play of the two lovers, 'It was the lark, the herald of the morn, / No Nightingale. ... I must be gone and live, or stay and die' (II. 6 - 11). With this, Juliet has no option but to agree, 'It is the lark that sings so out of tune, / Straining harsh discords and unpleasing sharps' (II. 27 - 28).

In this post-lapsarian world, the indulgence of love-speak is misplaced. As the nurse reprimands Romeo in Lawrence's cell for his despair, she encourages him to get up:

Stand up, stand up; stand, an you be a man;
For Juliet's sake, for her sake, rise and stand;
Why should you fall into so deep an O?

(III. iii. 88 - 90)
The double entendres of standing (to achieve an erection) and 'so deep an O' are just the kind of joke that Mercutio and the others would have relished in the earlier part of the play. Contained within the word 'fall' is the despair of Edenic loss. Like Adam and Eve, Romeo and Juliet are no longer nescient and the innocence of play - linguistic and sexual - is now lost to them. This is why the Nurse's jokes seem so out of place, clumsy, tactless, even unintentional.

IV

By the end of both plays, there is no pleasure left in the ambiguities of language. The double sign has brought us only as far as the forest in which Silvia is assaulted (and whose designation/destination is implicit in the polysemy of her name) and the Capulet tomb. The endings of both plays refuse the kinds of linguistic ambiguity that each had relished earlier on. Each play ends in a declaratory obviousness. In The Two Gentlemen of Verona, Valentine will rehearse the events that have brought the characters to this point:

I'll tell you, as we pass along,
That you will wonder what hath fortuned.
Come, Protheus, 'tis your penance, but to hear,
The story of your loves discovered.
That done, our day of marriage shall be yours;
One feast, one house, one mutual happiness!

(V. iv. 168 - 173)

51 Note Mercutio's vaginal joke about raising 'a spirit in his mistress' circle'. See above.
There is something poetically just about Proteus undergoing the humiliation of hearing his offences recounted. But whatever its effect, the retelling will surely be without the verbal adroitness that has characterised its occurrence. The law has no space for quibbles. The ending of Romeo and Juliet is even more peremptory. Again, the re-establishment of state power rests upon the elimination of all unsolved evidence. The state demands a clear synopsis:

Go hence, to have more talk of these sad things;
Some shall be pardon'd and some punished;
For never was a story of more woe,
Than this of Juliet and her Romeo.

(V. iii. 306 - 309)

R. L. Smallwood has noted the conclusiveness of the repetition of the play's title (albeit in inverted form) and Ruth Nevo has commented also on the appropriateness of the title to the ending of our other play, The Two Gentlemen of Verona is properly named ... [for] this is still a play in which the masculine view and the masculine initiative dominates.

The mystery of the sign is not permitted since, as we have seen, it has the potentiality to subvert social relationships between ruler and ruled, master and servant, and man and woman. Ambiguities are refused, signs at variance are forcibly re-fused into a system of signification that, above all else, makes complete sense.

Gerard Genette notes the peculiar reciprocity that occurs when signs are decoded within the context of literary criticism. The symbiosis between writing and critical discourse brings together the world of linguistic signs and the world of referents:

---

53 Smallwood notes that the same technique occurs at the end of Tis Pity She's a Whore, in 'Tis Pity She's a Whore and Romeo and Juliet, p. 68; Ruth Nevo, Comic Transformations in Shakespeare (London and New York, 1980), p. 56.
If the writer questions the universe, the critic questions literature, that is to say the universe of signs. But what was a sign for the writer (the work) becomes meaning for the critic (since it is the object of critical discourse), and in another way what was meaning for the writer (his view of the world) becomes a sign for the critic, as the theme and symbol of a certain literary nature. 54

As Lucentio leaves Biondello, so Shakespeare leaves each of us 'here behind to expound the meaning or moral of his signs' (Shrew, IV. iv. 78). Given the extraordinary richness and polysemic fullness of the Shakespearean sign, and Genette's insistence on the interdependence of sign in the work and meaning of the world, Hawkes's attitude towards the text as 'an area of conflicting and often contradictory potential interpretations' could be considered as something of a comfort.

Part Three: Society and Culture
The Eternal Mushroom of Humanity

Racism and Jewishness in The Jew of Malta and The Merchant of Venice

I was repelled by the conglomeration of races which the capital showed me, repelled by this whole mixture of Czechs, Poles, Hungarians, Ruthenians, Serbs, and Croats, and everywhere, the eternal mushroom of humanity - Jews and more Jews. To me this giant city seemed the embodiment of racial desecration. 1

Thus the author of Mein Kampf remembers the Vienna of his youth. That the wholesale industrialised slaughter of European 'inferiors' resulted solely from the psychotic ravings of this single maniac of ferocious genius, is a myth that has long been superseded by an awareness of economic and political problems of pre-war Germany like inflation and social unrest. The so-called 'Jewish Question' and its bald racial malevolence served as a vehicle for the articulation of more complicated and indeterminate difficulties. The marginalisation and destruction of the Jews provided, among other things, an outlet for racial aggression and at the same time fertilised the soil in which the roots of an iniquitous nationalism could flourish. The mission of National Socialism was to weed its green and pleasant land free of those alien races who, it alleged, were absorbing more than their fair share of sustenance. The confident magnificence of the Berlin Olympic stadium or Milan central station is accompanied by the long and mournful shadow of Auschwitz and Belsen. In the words of Walter Benjamin, one of the most significant philosophers and cultural critics of Hitler's Germany who took his own life while fleeing from the Nazis: 'There is no document of civilisation which is not at the same time a document of barbarism'.

It is with this paradoxical duality of Benjamin's notion of a cultural document that I want to explore The Jew of Malta and The Merchant of Venice and to reread both plays in the light of the suggestion that what we are actually doing when we watch, teach and act these plays is nothing less than rejuvenating and re-experiencing racist texts. In a society where the promotion of the incitement to racial hatred is illegal, and generally felt to be morally obscene, we do need to consider the implications of those texts inscribed at the centre of our Englishness, of our literature and our national identity. When these texts contain sentiments like those with which I opened this chapter, surely it is time to ensure that we are aware of the responsibilities we must shoulder in their continued promulgation.

The German critic Ernst Schumacher recently drew attention to the way in which The Merchant of Venice was appropriated and re-deployed in the cause of Nazism:

Hitler used it, Goebbels used it, and it contributed directly to the extermination of the Jews, the 'final solution' of 1943. The Minister for Propaganda is quoted in the six files for the extermination of the Jewish people as ordering a performance of The Merchant of Venice.

---

'Venice.... It is impossible in my view to play The Merchant of Venice in Germany after this example.'

This is an attitude to the work shared by some of its most distinguished commentators. In a letter to Ellen Terry (whose Portia was playing opposite Henry Irving's Shylock at the time), Lewis Carrol suggested that the court's sentence upon Shylock - that he convert to Christianity - be cut: 'It is a sentiment that is entirely horrible and revolting to the feelings of all who believe in the Gospel of Love. Why should our ears be shocked by such words merely because they are Shakespeare's?' More recently, D. M. Cohen opens his sensitive article on the play with the sentence, 'Current criticism notwithstanding, The Merchant of Venice seems to me a profoundly and crudely anti-Semitic play'. Of the Arden introduction, Cohen writes,

'It is all very well for John Russell Brown to say The Merchant of Venice is not anti-Jewish, and that 'there are only two slurs on Jews in general'; but this kind of assertion, a common enough one in criticism of the play, cannot account for the fear and shame that Jewish viewers and readers have always felt from the moment of Shylock's entrance to his final exit.... it is quite possible that Shakespeare didn't give a damn about Jews ... and that, if he did finally humanize his Jew, he did so simply to enrich his drama.'

Harold Bloom is another commentator who is disturbed by the tendency of critics to sentimentalise the play. In response to J. Middleton Murry's labelling The Merchant of Venice as an innocuous 'fairy story', Bloom writes, 'For us ... it had better be a problem play and not a fairy story.' W. H. Auden's essay on The Merchant of Venice, 'Brothers

---

4 Cited by Morton Cohen in 'Shylock through the looking glass', The Guardian, 4 August 1989. (Irving did not make the suggested cut.)
6 Ibid., p. 53.
and Others', is likewise uneasy about the play in the context of post-Holocaust history:
'Recent history has made it utterly impossible for the most unsophisticated and ignorant audience to ignore the historical reality of the Jews and think of them as fairy-story bogeys with huge noses and red wigs.' He adds sombrely, 'I think The Merchant of Venice must be classed among Shakespeare's "Unpleasant Plays."' 8

It is not only the play's critics who find The Merchant of Venice problematic; the theatre is also nervous about it. The artistic director of the Young Vic, David Thacker, remarks, 'If you think that The Merchant of Venice is an antisemitic play, the answer is not to change it but not to do it at all.' 9 In an education pack to accompany his 1990 production of the play for the English Shakespeare Company, Tim Luscombe roundly confronted the issue of racism: 'the question of the play's anti-Semitism is a sensitive one (it's a dangerous subject), and I wanted to be able to say that we had tackled it head-on, and done so in a responsible manner.' 10 Unfortunately, many actors and directors indulge in a kind of special pleading which is motivated by their desire to attribute to the playwright an egalitarian sensibility. In his theatre workshop, Playing Shakespeare (which was screened by Channel Four in 1984), John Barton worked with two distinguished Shylocks, David Suchet and Patrick Stewart. All of them are keen to divorce their image of the Bard from any charges of racism: 'I think one must forget modern anti-Semitism and concentrate on the play as writ' (Suchet); 'The anti-Semitism

---

9 Is Shakespeare Still Our Contemporary? p. 179. When Thacker produced The Two Gentlemen of Verona for the RSC in its 1991 - 92 season, he cut the play's anti-Semitism by excising the following lines: 'A Jew would have wept to have seen our parting' (II. iii. 9); 'thou art an Hebrew, a Jew, and not worth the name of a Christian' (II. v. 44).
10 Tim Luscombe, The Merchant of Venice and Volpone, Background Notes (London, 1990), p. 2. For Luscombe's production, see below.
of the play ... is a distraction' (Stewart); and perhaps most feebly Barton himself, 'we're not here to talk about anti-Semitism but about character.'

In voicing the assertion that The Merchant of Venice is racist one runs the risk of being branded a philistine or the charge that one is 'over-sensitive'. There is an extraordinary reluctance on the part of some literary critics as well as thespians to see the play as anything other than one of Shakespeare's forgiving comedies. Nevill Coghill in the teeth of the play's vicious ending and the court's insistence on the Jew's religious conversion protests that 'Shylock has at least been given his chance of eternal joy ... Mercy has triumphed over justice, even if the way of mercy is a hard way!' Even more dangerous than this propensity to romanticise, is the insistence that the present misgivings about the moral standing of the play are somehow anachronistic. Marion D. Perret writes impatiently that The Merchant of Venice will probably never be produced without someone's complaining about anti-Semitism.' She goes on to castigate productions (the most notable of which was Jonathan Miller's National Theatre production of 1970) which are designed to emphasise Jewish suffering:

Effective as it is, when followed too enthusiastically, this approach encourages deliberate distortion of the text. Shakespeare clearly did not intend to portray Shylock favorably ... If we assume that Shakespeare can be made non-anti-Semitic only by being made non-Shakespearean, simple logic suggests that Shakespeare is indeed, for whatever reasons, anti-Semitic. Behind the National Theatre's adaptation seems to lie the assumption that being unflattering to this particular Jew is tantamount to being prejudiced against all Jews.

---

12 Nevill Coghill, 'The Basis of Shakespearean Comedy', Essays and Studies, 3 (1950), 1 - 28, p. 23. David Suchet agrees, 'Shylock himself is perhaps the first Jew in literature to have the chance of his soul being saved.' (Playing Shakespeare, p. 170.)

The problems with this account foreground precisely those assumptions that this thesis as a whole is designed to challenge. The production values and ideological accents of the Renaissance theatre are now lost to us. Modern theatre productions are incalculably different from those which Shakespeare's audience may have experienced. This fact alone makes Perret's stress on Shakespeare's intentionality deeply unrealisable. There is frankly, no way we can ever be sure what the playwright intended. As such, a 'distortion of the text', let alone a 'deliberate distortion of the text', is simply indeterminable, since there is no Shakespearean master-text from which to measure the apparent deviations of any modern reading or production. The final sentence reveals the absurd shallowness of Perret's reading of The Merchant of Venice itself, for throughout, Shylock is insulted as a Jew. In the court scene, for example, while Antonio is addressed nominally, Shylock is called 'Shylock' six times while he is addressed as 'Jew' twenty-two. Perret remarks that 'Shakespeare's play ... was never intended to correct the injustices of twentieth-century history.' By hypothesising this bogus intentionality, Perret infuses her reading with a chimera of historical authenticity. In a separate article published five years later, Perret reinforces what she takes to be the inappropriateness of seeing a four-hundred-year-old play through the lens of the intervening period, 'Shakespeare [is] innocent of modern history and not responsible for our preconceptions'. What she fails to realise, is that her own critical position is historically situated and embedded within power structures and ideologies which are themselves the result of historical discourses - including the history of racial oppression of the Jewish people. It is not a question of imposing the gas chambers onto the play, it is rather that the play is now encrusted with a knowledge of the Holocaust and that The Merchant of Venice and its own cultural history are impossible to separate. As Horst Meller puts it, > we in Germany, after the genocide perpetrated by the Nazis, will > never now be able to watch the staging of the downfall of Shylock > from the Rialto ghetto, driven by hatred and thirst for revenge, > without being reminded of the fate of the Jews in the Warsaw ghetto > and in Auschwitz.

---

In fact, as Ernst Schumacher noted above, The Merchant of Venice was an ideal vehicle for the promulgation of Nazi ideology. In September 1939 all playwrights of enemy nationality were banned in the German theatre. Shakespeare however, on the order of the Ministry of Propaganda, was to be treated as a German. While almost the entire canon was staged during the course of the war the most frequently performed play was, perhaps unsurprisingly, The Merchant of Venice. Shortly after Kristallnacht in 1938,
The Merchant of Venice was broadcast for propagandistic ends over the German airwaves. Productions of the play followed in Lübeck (1938), Aachen (1940), Berlin (1942), Göttingen (1942), and Vienna (1943). According to Werner Habicht, the play was produced approximately fifty times between 1933 and 1944 and productions 'invariably exhibited anti-Semitic and racist interpretations of Shylock'. Moreover, the ending of the play was frequently rewritten to prevent the 'mixed' marriage of Lorenzo and Jessica.

---

20 Maria Verch, The Merchant of Venice on the German Stage since 1945, Theatre History Studies, 1985, 84 - 94, p. 91.
We should note here that the polysemy of Shakespeare's text has enabled the same play to be appropriated and produced by the very victims against whom its Nazi productions were targeted, although usually not without public controversy. Leopold Jessner directed the first Hebrew production of the play at the Habimah Theatre in 1936. One reviewer commented frostily, 'In spite of Jessner's promises in all his speeches that his production was to stress only those points which will suit the Hebrew stage, most of the Gentiles appeared almost as decent human beings'. For this reviewer, Shakespeare's Jew stood for the plight of the whole Jewish people, 'what Shylock symbolizes [is] the humiliation of Israel, for which there is no pardon in the world for ever and ever!' When Yossi Yzraeli staged The Merchant of Venice in Tel Aviv in 1972, the difficulty of producing the play was illustrated. Hayim Gamzu wrote, 'It is but natural that we Jews are practically allergic to a typical antisemitic interpretation'. The Nazi enthusiasm for The Merchant of Venice and the Hebrew reticence towards it do imply that the play is loaded against Jewishness.

Although an English audience is removed from direct cultural experience of Nazi Germany or Zionist Israel, The Merchant of Venice is still a potentially dangerous play; a recent example will illustrate. In a review of the 1984 RSC Merchant (directed by John Caird), William Frankel attacked the production on the grounds that its central performance, by Ian McDiarmid, did nothing to challenge the medieval stereotype of Jews as 'comic, villainous and avaricious, cruel and insolent in success, servile in

---

Having described the humiliation and embarrassment of reading The Merchant as the only Jewish boy in his class, Frankel continues:

> Actors and directors operate in a world which is not entirely populated by the educated and sophisticated. Prejudice, bigotry, discrimination and even persecution have not disappeared. The reproduction, in this real world, of ancient stereotypes should take into account their potential for inciting or reinforcing racial or religious prejudice. I believe that Mr McDiarmid's Shylock can have that effect, a view which was fortified at Stratford by the approving reception some members of the audience gave to the most virulent passages of the play. 26

Frankel's criticism led to the subsequent rewriting of the production's programme under the supervision of no less than Sir Kenneth Cork (the then chair of the RSC Council). The RSC, like all other theatre companies, commonly inserts errata slips in programmes and will frequently publish a revised edition to include production shots and cast changes where necessary, but it is extremely rare for it to go to the expense of resetting and reprinting an entire programme. The amended text included reference to the Holocaust together with a disclaimer that the anti-Semitism of the fifteenth- and sixteenth-century extracts (that it had previously printed) reflected 'the ignorance, prejudice and cruelty of the times.' David Hewson in a subsequent article on the controversy pointed out that 'One of those understood to have complained is Mr Cyril Stein, head of Ladbrokes which has sponsored RSC productions in the past.' 27 Whether or not the RSC would have gone to the trouble of composing a new programme had one of its major sponsors not been offended is a question left alarmingly open.

26 Ibid.
27 The Times, 4 May 1984.
One of the most profound ironies surrounding the RSC Merchant concerned McDiarmid's own attitudes. In an interview published before the production opened, he said that his Shylock 'will be just as Jewish as I can make him, although I am not a Jew.'\textsuperscript{28} In other words, his performance would rely on the manipulation and recognition of a stereotype of 'Jewishness' - not Shakespeare's portrait of a specific Venetian businessman informed as it may be by medieval convention. McDiarmid would model his performance on the way in which he saw Jews at that moment, as a type, as a \textit{race}. Although the criticism of McDiarmid did not go unnoticed by the actor - in fact he threatened legal action against Frankel\textsuperscript{29} - he later seemed quite complacent about the seriousness of the charge laid against his performance. In a subsequent account of the production and the controversy that surrounded it he wrote,

\begin{quote}
Regrettably few people coming to the play would be encountering it for the first time. The problem seemed less to do with my "old luggage" than with theirs.... Controversy will never be far away when this play is performed. Shylock remains, indisputably, a figure of great energy and passion and like all such figures arouses sharply conflicting emotions perhaps most of all in those who lack his dynamism.\textsuperscript{30}
\end{quote}

This example shows that the racism present in drama exists on two strata - that which is inscribed in plays where people spit upon Jewish gabardines, and that which surfaces during the reproduction of such plays where actors delineate their characters by referring to racial stereotypes.

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{28} The Times, 9 April 1984.
  \item \textsuperscript{29} This threat was withdrawn after The Times published a reply from McDiarmid on its letters page. The Times, 1 May, 1984; see also the Jewish Chronicle, 4 May, 1984.
\end{itemize}
In Gender, Race, Renaissance Drama, Ania Loomba considers the racism of the English theatrical establishment. In her opinion, 'it is obvious that theatrical authenticity is a way of holding on to a lost empire'. She cites the following editorial in one of the most popular drama journals Plays and Players, responding to Hugh Quarshie's remark that Enobarbus being played by a black actor was 'a real coup': 'Too true Hugh. It will also be a coup when played by a Chinese midget, nude on rollerskates, and just as relevant.'

The complaint that the casting of black actors is not authentic is somewhat bewildering when we consider that multitudes of white Othellos have been tolerated and indeed that we are so used to seeing white Cleopatras, that we are surprised to note her lines 'Think on me, / That am with Phoebus' amorous pinches black' (I. v. 27 - 28). If the standard complaint holds that black actors are not properly Shakespearean, the same goes for women. The point of all this is that (in the words of Loomba) 'Renaissance drama ... constitutes the privileged core of the canon of master texts of English Literature', and these plays are not merely about race, but consistently demand during the course of their reproduction that their modern directors and producers negotiate a minefield of contemporary ideological and political problems.

In 1985 Jean-Marie Maguin recognised the sensitivity aroused by our two plays. He wrote:

> The fierce barrage of criticism which the latest productions of The Jew of Malta in Paris, and The Merchant of Venice in both Paris and Stratford-upon-Avon in late years - never fiercer than in the 1984 Stratford production of Merchant [the production I alluded to above] -

32 Ibid., p. 144.
33 On the subject of the boy actor playing female roles in the period, see chapter VIII.
34 Loomba, Gender, Race, Renaissance Drama, p. 34.
makes it unlikely that a company will again dare to attempt a double bill such as the RSC presented in 1965. 35

Maguin goes on to say that 'it is true that it is difficult in the second half of the twentieth century to see a play like The Jew of Malta away from the Holocaust'. 36 Despite Maguin's confidence, in 1987, the RSC staged just such a double bill. Bill Alexander's Venice opened in the main house just five weeks before Barry Kyle's Malta opened in the Swan next door. The director of the second play recently expressed his misgivings about the issues raised by its production:

I read The Jew of Malta when I was a student and thought it was unrevivable. I find the whole issue of anti-semitic drama and whether you should revive it very difficult. I've actually directed The Merchant of Venice in Israel, so I've been through this discussion at some length. It was quite influential on the thinking I had in The Jew of Malta. I couldn't bear the idea of it seeming to be an anti-semitic piece of work. 37

Like it or not (and Kyle plainly finds it embarrassing), these plays contain the most vehement kinds of racial abuse. Barabas is variously 'an infidel', with 'bottle-nose', Shylock is a Jewish cut-throat dog, continually spat upon. Both are exploited, persecuted, lose their daughters, finally ruined and in one case, murdered.

Along with Kyle, the tendency of modern directors has been to exculpate the plays by courting audience sympathy for their protagonists. Barabas and Shylock are turned into innocent victims - Christians into brutal thugs. In Peter Hall's 1989 production, for example, in response to Shylock's good humoured assent to the bond - he offered

36 Ibid., p. 17.
37 This Golden Round: The Royal Shakespeare Company at the Swan, edited by Ronnie Mulryne and Margaret Shewring (Stratford-on-Avon, 1989), p. 75.
Antonio his hand - the merchant spat fully in his face. The tiny frame of Dustin Hoffman was continually surrounded and jostled by thuggish Christians who pulled off his yarmulke and shoved him from one to another. Ian Lavender's Solanio relished the lamentation of Shylock for his lost daughter, impersonating him in a hyperbolic Jewish accent. Leon Lissek's Tubal was spat on across the width of the set, but passively and nonchalantly walked down stage to join his countryman. Hoffman was less philosophical about things. While the first half located audience sympathy firmly on Shylock's side, the opening scene of the second half found Antonio in chains on his knees in front of his litigious enemy. Shylock bent over him and spat as he was later to do with hysterical vehemence in the court-room.

Hoffman's charm percolated through his characterisation and made his Shylock a man more sinned against than sinning. His only resistance to the attacks of the Venetians was to raise his hands to protect himself or in a gesture of appeasement, coupled with Hoffman's wry half-smile. His interpretation of the poetry was adroit and deft. The catalogue of abuse that Antonio has hurled his way in the past was recounted, quite neutrally, to explain the illogicality of expecting Shylock's help. In the court-room (plate J), adamant in the repetition of his 'bond', Hoffman bellowed for justice and quivered with frustration - Tubal would never rage thus. At 'Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses...' Hoffman's voice was barely a whisper and the pain of social rejection was meekly and passionately suggested.

Whereas many recent versions of The Merchant of Venice attempt to dilute the anti-Semitism of the script in this way, by making the Christians just as bad, if not worse than the Jew, Tim Luscombe's recent production for the ESC bravely acknowledged that there is little attractive or sympathetic about Shylock and so his money lender was a vindictive and calculating operator. Luscombe's production attempted to avoid the charge of anti-Semitism. He set the play in the Venice of the late thirties and this allowed him to depict Salerio and Solanio as members of Mussolini's army. The Duke in the court room wore the Duce's cap and the uniform of a fascist general. Characters greeted each other with the raised hand of the fascist salute. The growing tension in pre-war Italian society was nicely schematised in the programme for us, and Luscombe freely interpolated scenes to eke out the text socially in useful ways. When Shylock told Tubal that he would meet him at the synagogue, there followed a scene of the ritual prayer of an assembly of Jews in religious shawls. During the night of the masque, a lone Jew was set upon by Gratiano et al. and beaten up. A procession of jeering Venetians walked across the stage with banners depicting the star of David crossed through and holding aloft Jewish effigies. With all of this racist oppression, there was no need to make Shylock into a pathetic figure nor was there any need to evoke our sympathies for him. Luscombe's direction of the play managed to provoke our sense of indignation on behalf of the members of a social group who find themselves being socially victimised, without compromising the vicious and appalling determination of Shylock to see the personal ruination and execution of the merchant. However understandable it may be to destroy the persecutor, the desire to cut out the heart of another living human being can never be morally defended. To make us feel sorry for Shylock is to reduce the rich ambiguities of the play and, it seems, Luscombe is well aware of this fact.

Shylock (John Woodvine) was a successful businessman. Sitting behind his black satin desk with telephone and papers, he flicked through documents in front of him with a nonchalant and self-satisfied air, to determine the whereabouts of Antonio's ships. Antonio entered and Shylock pronounced, 'How like a fawning publican he looks!' (I. iii. 36). This line, which usually gets a laugh, was damning and icy and Shylock appeared to be less an ironic observer comically chatting about Laban's sheep than a magnificent adversary plotting the personal destruction of a man that, as he tells us, he hates. As he says later in the play, 'since I am a dog, beware my fangs' (III. iii. 7). Woodvine's Shylock was cool even while Antonio walked around his seated figure and sententiously told Bassanio that the devil can cite scripture. But in response to Antonio's question, 'Well, Shylock, shall we be beholding to you?' (I. iii. 100), the Jew lost his temper and slammed his hand down upon the desk. This brief show of passion was quickly controlled as Shylock stood to confront Antonio face to face. The forfeiture was suggested more as a challenge than anything and Antonio leapt into the trap.

Later, as Shylock prepared to leave his house for the business meeting with his clients, he paced worriedly up and down and continually proffered Jessica his keys. As he took stock of the consequences of leaving her with his money, he repeatedly withdrew them and only handed them over after he had given her a stiff talking to. Luscombe made no concessions in the way of suggesting that he was a loving father and this had dramatic consequences as Shylock lamented the loss of the ducats and the loss of his daughter together - 'I would my daughter were dead at my foot, and the jewels in her ear' (III. i. 92). Even during Shylock's most pathetic speech 'Hath not a Jew eyes?' (III. i. 76), Woodvine played the character as a defiant and mighty opposite. He never wanted sympathy - only justice. Woodvine's Shylock has been dehumanised by the savagery that he and his race have experienced. As he told Salerio, 'The villainy you teach me will I execute; and it shall go hard but I will better the instruction' (III. i. 61). This world of callous intolerance was starkly portrayed in Paul Farnsworth's monochrome design. The crimson cloths of the court (plate K) offered the only instance of colour while all the costumes, even in Belmont, were black and white. Leonard Tucker lit the set with what looked like enormous interrogation lamps, fixed to three scaffold observation towers, and the theatre lanterns were rigged to complement this feeling of starkness.

Kyles's Jew of Malta is another example of an anti-Christian production of an anti-Semitic text. It opposed a witty and adroit Alun Armstrong as Barabas against a ruthless and hard-faced John Carlisle as Ferneze (plate L). Moreover this production left us in no doubt who the real enemy was. At the opening, Machevil's prologue was spoken from a trapeze in a savage mock-Italian drawl. At the end of the play following Barabas's execution (plate M), Ferneze stepped onto the trapeze as it was raised from the trap door. He gave his last speech but at the lines: 'So, march away, and let due praise be given / Neither to fate nor fortune, but to heaven' (V. v. 122 - 123), he pulled off his wig to reveal Machevil's black hair and affected the accent of the opening prologue. The real Machevil, the production assured us, is not the wicked Jew, but the scheming and successful Christian governor. Read against their own anti-Semitic grain then, it is possible to continue to stage these plays and avoid the charge of racism, but this saving of the appearances has not always been possible.

II

By the year of Marlowe's and Shakespeare's birth, Jews had been officially banned from England for over three hundred years. England had excelled in its hostility towards the Jews, being the first country to implement the compulsory wearing of the yellow badge, and to expel, following a series of massacres, the entire Jewish population from its national territory. Before their official expulsion, Jews had been subject to special laws; they had no right of inheritance as they were legally regarded as royal serfs, their money going to the crown upon their death. They were disproportionally taxed; constituting 0.25% of the population in the twelfth century and yet supplying the treasury with 8% of its income. The drama of the middle ages repeatedly associates its stock Vice/Jew figure with Satan and the Jews are held directly responsible for the death of Christ. Chaucer's The Prioress's Tale is representative of the medieval stereotype of the Jewish race. In it a seven-year-old Christian boy learns to sing the Latin anthem 'Gracious Mother of the Redeemer'. He sings it on his way to school which takes him through the Jewish quarter of town. The Jews, who we are told, entertain in their hearts the wasp-nest of Satan, find his song offensive to their religion and arrange to have his throat cut and his body thrown into a cesspit. The body continues to sing and is eventually recovered while 'the cursed Jews' are hung drawn and quartered. The tale is significant not merely in the intensity and hyperbole of its racism but in as much as it accords with medieval stereotypes of Semitic violence. The Tale is based, as the Prioress tells us, on the story of the sainted martyr Hugh of Lincoln - a nine-year-old boy supposed to have been ritually slaughtered by Jews in 1255. Such stories of Jewish atrocities were commonplace and can be found as early as the fifth century. Infanticide and child crucifixion were especially common accusations. Such legends abound in the middle ages and survive well into the Renaissance. When Bernadine in The Jew of Malta tells Jacomo that he has something 'to exclaim against the Jew', his fellow friar replies, 'What has he crucified a child?' (III. vi. 46 - 49). Shylock persistently talks like a cannibal. As he leaves Jessica he tells her, 'I'll go in hate, to feed upon / The prodigal Christian' (II. v. 14 - 15) and he later tells Salerio that he will use Antonio's flesh 'To bait fish withal. If it will feed nothing else, it will feed my revenge' (III. i. 44). For the Renaissance anti-usurers, Luther provided the theological ratification of this murderous threat from the Jews, 'Luther for their deceit and malice, doeth almost think them to be very Deuels.'

---

Barabas describes such 'standard' Jewish cruelty to Ithamore and goes on to characterise his way of living, revelling in its sadism:

As for myself, I walk abroad o' nights,
And kill sick people groaning under walls;
Sometimes I go about and poison wells;
And now and then, to cherish Christian thieves,
I am content to lose some of my crowns,
That I may, walking in my gallery,
See 'em go pinioned along by my door.
Being young, I studied physic, and began
To practise first upon the Italian;
There I enriched the priest with burials,
And always kept the sexton's arms in use
With digging graves and ringing dead men's knells;
And after that was I an engineer,
And in the wars 'twixt France and Germany,
Under pretence of helping Charles the Fifth,
Slew friend and enemy with my stratagems.
Then after that I was an usurer,
And with extorting, cozening, forfeiting,
And tricks belonging unto brokery
I filled the jails with bankrupts in a year.
And with young orphans planted hospitals,
And every moon made some or other mad,
And now and then one hang himself for grief,
Pinning upon his breast a long great scroll
How I with interest tormented him.

(I. i. 176 - 200)

Ever since William I brought a colony of Jews from France, they were associated with such financial dealings. For Henrie Smith, the rapacity of usury was simply another symptom of Jewish disobedience:

The first Usurers which we read of, were the Jews, which were forbidden to be usurers; yet for want of faith and love, Ezekiel and Nehemiah doth shew, how the Jews, even the Jews which received this law from God himself, did swear from it as they did from the rest. First they began to lend upon usury to strangers, after they began to lend upon usury to their brethren; and now there be no such Usurers upon the earth, as the Jews which were forbidden to be Usurers: whereby you may see, how the malice of man hath turned mercy into cruelty.

Credit and money-lending were outlawed by the Church. Thomas Lodge is adamant about its immorality and the consequent irreligion of those who pursued it: 'this by the commandment is forbidden to be followed, and therefore irreligious are they that use it.' Usury was condemned on two counts: first it was unjust because it was contrary to natural law, a type of theft, and secondly because of the Aristotelian belief that money was sterile in itself and therefore unable naturally to reproduce. In his essay 'Of Usury' Francis Bacon notes the proverbial sterility of money, 'it is against nature for money to beget money'. When Antonio tells Shylock that if he furnishes the loan, he will be lending it to his enemy, he too notes the infertile character of money, 'for when did friendship take / A breed for barren metal of his friend?' (I. iii. 128 - 129). Above all money-lending was unnatural: 'contrary to nature and common sense [usury] will make that to engender, which being without life by no way can increase.' Roger Fenton likens the reproduction of money to a prodigious and agonising birth calling such profits 'the brood of money':

A woman in travel ... doth not sweat and labour to bring forth with greater anguish of mind, then a debtor compelled to bring home the principal with increase.... this usurious increase of money, which is neither fruitful by nature, as land and cattle: nor fit for any other

---

41 Henrie Smith, The Sermons of Master Henrie Smith, gathered into one volume. Printed according to his corrected copies in his lifetime (London, 1592), p. 165.
42 Thomas Lodge, An Alarum against Usurers. Containing tried experiences against worldly abuses (London, 1584), F iii².
44 Caesar, A General Discourse, p. 5².
secondarie vse, as to feede, or to cure, or to clothe, or to shelter; but only to procure such things as have increase and vse in themselves: that such increase (I say) of so barren a thing, as ... money ... is unnaturall.

For Francis Meres, the activity of usury is as bad as child molesting. He cites the same two objections, unnaturalness and infertility:

_As Pederastiae is unlawful, because it is against kinde: so vsurie and encrease by gold and siluer is unlawful, because against nature; nature hath made them sterill and barren & vsurie makes them procreative._

Aquinas states categorically that to 'take usury for money lent is unjust in itself, because this is to sell what does not exist, and this evidently leads to inequality which is contrary to justice.' The notion of the usurer selling time which belongs to God is a common one. (Indeed, not until the nineteenth-century was the Holy Office allowed to absolve money-lenders!) Money-lending was a mortal sin, but since Jews were going to Hell anyway, it didn't matter that they dabbled in it; in the words of two of the anti-usurers of the day, '[the usurer's] soule polluted with this vice, and defiled with that damnable synne, [shall] be cast by the iustice of God into euerlasting tormentes'; 'the woord of God abandonneth Vsurie euen to hel'. Fenton relishes the agony of the damned usurer, 'Most wofull is the passage of the Vsurer out of this life; whose death is detestable, whose end is damnation, whose damnation is without end' and Smith notes that the usurer's sin was sufficient to necessitate their forfeiting a proper burial, 'the Cannon law ... dooth depreie him of his Sepulchre, and will not suffer him to be buried, as though hee

---

46 Francis Meres, _Palladiis Tamia_ (London, 1598), Tt 2'.
48 Caesar, _A General Discourse_, p. 2y; Phillip Stubbes, _The Anatomy of Abuses_ (London, 1583), K vii'.
were worthie to lie in the earth, but to lie in hell.' For Phillip Stubbes, usury was comparable with homicide. In a section headed 'Vusury equall with Murder', he explains:

> And good reason, for he that killeth a [sic] man, riddeth him out of his paines at once, but he that taketh vsury is long in butchering his pacient, suffering him by little & little to languish, and sucking out his hart blood, (that is lucre and gaine) comming forth of him. The Usurer killeth not one, but many, both Husband, Wife, Children, seruants, famelie and all, not sparing any.

Philip Caesar considered the usurer as the meeting place of every kind of vice:

> Thei are called wasters, pollers [extortioners], stealers, of holie thynges, Theecues, Murtherers, Idolaters, cousins to fooles, as ill as madde men, because contrary to the nature of thynges thei make that too engender, whiche cannot fructifie.

The sinfulness of usury was connected with the curse of God upon Adam; Bacon explains: 'the usurer breaketh the first law that was made for mankind after the fall, which was, in sudore vultûs tui comedes panem tuum; not, in sudore vultûs alienV. For Meres this was another disqualification of usury from legitimate practice, 'Vsurers live on the sweat of other mens browes, and enjoy the fruit of other mens labours, agaynst the ordinaunce of God and man.' The distinction between brother and stranger is critical and the biblical text on usury makes just this distinction, 'Thou shalt not lend vpon vsury to thy brother; vsury of money, vsury of victuals, vsury of any thing that is lent vpon

---

50 Stubbes, The Anatomy of Abuses, K vii. The image of the usurer sucking out the heart of the victim anticipates Shylock's demand to have 'A pound of flesh, to be cut off / Nearest the merchant's heart' (IV. i. 233 - 234).
51 A General Discovse, p. 37.
52 Essays, p. 123.
53 Palladis Tamia, Tt 27.
vsury. Vnto a stranger thou maiest lend vpovn vsury, but vnto thy brother thou shalt not lend vpovn vsury'. 54 Stubbes reluctantly concedes that this at least is a Jewish virtue, 'An vsurer is worse than a Jew, for they to this daye, will not take anye Vsurie of their Brethren, according to the lawe of GOD.' 55 Tubal, of course, does not charge Shylock. Fenton is not so magnanimous, hypothesising that the limitation of Jewish usury to Gentiles is a consequence of their overwhelming greed: 'such was the hardness of Jewish hearts, that if they might not haue taken vsurie of strangers, they also would haue made a pray euen of their owne brethren.' 56

The Jews were the major (although by no means the only) credit brokers in the Renaissance. 57 Merchants, like Shakespeare's Antonio, were continually using Jewish money to back their ventures and in an age burgeoning with financial dealings and trade, credit and usury were vital. Jewish moneylending literally put the capital into Capitalism. Walter Cohen accounts for the popular contempt for Jews and usurers with reference to the period as a time of elemental economic change and he notes the 'crisis of the aristocracy' that such change produced:

Behind [the] fear [of usury] lay the transition to capitalism: the rise of banking; the increasing need for credit in industrial enterprises; and the growing threat of indebtedness facing both aristocratic landlords and, above all, small, independent producers, who could easily decline to working-class status.... we are confronted with the 54 Deuteronomy 23. 19 - 20. Henrie Smith also notes Exodus 22 and Leviticus 25 as biblical texts outlawing usury (The Sermons of Master Henrie Smith, pp. 168). Among the humanist sources regularly cited against usury were, Plato, Aristotle, Cato, Seneca, Pliny, Plutarch (see for example, Fenton, A Treatise of Vsurie, pp. 66 - 67).

55 Anatomy of Abuses, K viii^.

56 A Treatise of Vsurie, p. 45.

57 Fenton cites S. Bernard, 'if the Iewes were any where wanting, Christian Vsurers did play the Iewes worse then themselves', Ibid., p. 52.
For Frank Wigham the contention between Antonio and Shylock occurs 'in a social context where the old feudal hierarchy is being reordered by the pressures of capitalism' and Camille Pierre Laurent recognises the play's setting as significant as a city state of economic revolution, 'Venice's society is in transition between the feudal, or aristocratic, and the new bourgeois order.' It is within the context of the transitional state of the economic base that we should place the conflict of Antonio, the trade capitalist, and Shylock, the usurer. For Walter Cohen, the play 'may be seen as a special instance of the struggle, widespread in Europe, between Jewish quasi-feudal fiscalism and native bourgeois mercantilism ... Both the characterization and the outcome of The Merchant of Venice mark Antonio as the harbinger of modern values.... Shylock is ... an old man with obsolete values trying to arrest the course of history.' Despite the widespread currency of this theory of feudalistic economic organisation yielding, or being forced to yield, to a capitalistic new order, the theory itself may be over-schematic. Although Antonio and Shylock earn their living in very different ways, there is an obvious symbiosis between them and the economic systems they stand for. According to Roger Fenton, usury 'is so twisted into every trade and commerce, one mouing the other, by this engine, like the wheeles in a clocke, that it seemeth the very frame and course of traffick must needes by altered before this can by reformed.' Trade needs usury to survive. The necessity of usury was begrudgingly admitted during the period. Bacon, while he noted that moneylending could jeopardise trade by putting some merchants out of business, regarded it as a necessary evil:

---

60 Cohen, The Merchant of Venice and the Problems of Historical Criticism, p. 771.

\[\text{howsoever usury in some respect hindereth merchandizing, yet in some other it advanceth it; for it is certain that the greatest part of trade is driven by young merchants upon borrowing at interest; so as, if the usuer either call in or keep back his money, there will ensue presently a great stand of trade.}\]

Bacon recognises that usury stimulates trade and moreover that in the capitalistic new world order, it is here to stay, 'to speak of the abolishing of usury is idle. All states have ever had it, in one kind or rate or other. So as that opinion must be sent to Utopia.' Thomas Lodge concurs and suggests ironically that it is the very demand of usurers by the state that makes them so unholy, 'their necessarinesse in this world, makes them vnnecessary for God.' Opposed as the leading protagonists seem to be in The Merchant of Venice, there is a pronounced interdependence between them which enacts the interdependence of the two economic systems. Stephen Greenblatt notes the subtle semblance between merchant and Jew which is masked by their ostensible hostility: The Jew is charged not with racial deviance or religious impiety but with economic and social crime, crime that is committed not only against the dominant Christian society, but in less "pure" form, by that society. Of Marlowe's Jew he adds, 'Barabas expresses in extreme, unmediated form the motives that have been partially disguised by the spiritual humbug of Christianity.'

\[\text{62 Essays, p. 124.}\]
\[\text{63 Ibid., p. 124.}\]
\[\text{64 An Alarm against Vseurers. E ii}.\]
\[\text{66 Ibid., p. 47.}\]
In the first scene of Marlowe’s play, Barabas reminds us of his business associates:

They say we are a scattered nation;
I cannot tell, but we have scrambled up
More wealth by far than those that brag of faith.
There’s Kirriah Jairim, the great Jew of Greece,
Obed in Bairseth, Nones in Portugal,
Myself in Malta, some in Italy,
Many in France, and wealthy every one:
Ay, wealthier far than any Christian.

(I. i. 120 - 127)

The common pun on use and Jews (luse) makes money-lending the trade of this religious and racial group. The argument followed rapidly that because the Jews were supposedly wealthy, they ought to be made to pay more tax. They were required, for example, to pay half of the 10,000 marks to ransom back King Richard I and they were taxed on a quarter of their moveable property as opposed to the tenth that everyone else paid. In Venice, they were confined to a specific area of the city and forced to take out a permanent lease on that area at a third above the usual rate. In Marlowe’s play of course, Ferneze’s decree ensures that racial discrimination forms just such a basis for paying the Turkish tribute: it ‘shall all be levied amongst the Jews, and each of them to pay one-half of his estate.’ (I. ii. 70). The perception of Jewish prosperity, just like that which immediately preceded the Second World War, frequently made them the object of enmity. In particular the association between Jews and faeces was popular. In the poem, ‘A new Song, shewing the crueltie of Genutus, a Jewe, who, lending to a merchant an hundred crowns, would have a pound of fleshe, because he could not pay him at the time appointed’, which pertinently is set in Venice, the Jew is likened first to a pig, and subsequently to a pile of manure:

In Venice towne not long agoe
A cruel Jew did dwell,
Which lived all on usurie,
As Italian writers tell.
Gernutus called was the Jew,
Which never thought to dye,
Nor ever yet did any good
To them in streets would lie.

His life was like a barrow hogge,
That liveth many a day,
Yet never once doth any good,
Until men will him slay.

Or like a filthy heap of dung,
That lieth in a whoard;
Which never can do any good,
Till it be spread abroad. 67

This association of usurers with faecal matter seems to be a Renaissance commonplace. Francis Meres likens the activity of borrowing to wallowing in a septic tank: 'As he that tumbleth in the mire, becommeth more foule and filthie: so they become more and more indebted, that haue to doe with Vsurers.' 68 He goes on to develop the association, comparing material and faecal costiveness:

Cholericke men, that will not be purged in time, dayly increase their humor, til dangerously they be diseased: so they that suffer vsury to increase and grow vpon them, and do not discharge themselues of it, doe run into irrecoverable danger & peril. 69

Fabyan's Chronicles (1516) relishes another alarming instance of the association of Jew with excrement:

In this yere also [1259], fell that happe of the Iewe of Tewkysbury, which fell into a gonge [ie, a cess pit] vpon the Satyrday, and wolde not, for reuerence of his sabot day, be pluckyd out; whereof heryng the earle of Gloucetyr that the Iewe dyd so great reuerence to his sabot daye, thought he wolde doo as moche vnto his holy day, which 68 Palladis Tamia, 'T 2'.

69 Ibid., 'T 2'
was Sunday, and so kepte hym there tyll Monday, at whiche season, he was foundyn dede. 70

Caesar insists on this faecal association with the aid of an authority: usurers 'are like to vessels full of all stinking carrion, and filthe. For so doeth S. Brigel wright of them in this maner: The wicked are full of ambition, and couetousnesse, which dooe more stincke in the sight of God, and his sainctes, than any filthe in the eyes of men.' 71 The proverbial smell of the Jew, the foeder Judaicus, was associated with the bizarre myth according to which Jewish men were said to menstruate. Thomas Calvert's Diatriba of the Jews' Estate is not sure whether to go along with this peculiar assertion, choosing instead to 'leave it to the learned to judge and determine by writers or Travellers, whether this be true or no, either that they have a monthly Flux of Blood, or a continuall mal-odoriferous breath.' 72 In his characteristically conciliatory way, Thomas Browne refutes the charge that gives the blunt title to his essay, 'That Jews stinke':

Now the ground that begat or propagated this assertion might be the distastfull aversenesse of the Christian from the Jew, upon the villany of that fact, which made them abominable and stinck in the nostrils of all men; which reall practise, and metaphorical expression, did after proceed into a literall construction 73

Although, as Browne points out, the myth has its origins in the metaphors of hate, the very existence of his essay demonstrates a common belief in its veracity. The putative impurity of the Jews provided a pretext with which, exactly as in the case of Hitler's Germany, to justify their annihilation. In Leicester for example, Simon de Montfort was 70 Cited by Peter Warlock in his edition of John Harington's Metamorphosis of Ajax, (London, 1927), p. 129. Stubbes voices a similar contempt for this Sabbatarian reverence, 'Christe hath taught us, the Sabaoth was made for Man, not Man for the Sabaoth.' Anatomy of Abuses, L ilii.

71 A General Discourse, p. 4f.
72 Cited by Shapiro, Shakespeare and the Jews, p. 22. granted the earldom in August 1231. His charter of 1253 reads, 'Know ... that I, for the good of my soul, and the souls of my ancestors have granted ... that no Jew or Jewess, in my time or in the time of any of my heirs to the end of the world, shall within the liberty of the town of Leicester, inhabit or remain or obtain a residence.' This kind of malicious victimisation brought about a whole string of thirteenth-century Jewish massacres at places including York, King's Lynn and Stamford. After 1217 Jews were compelled to wear the yellow badge and by 1282 only one synagogue remained in London. Having twice petitioned to leave England, they were finally expelled in 1290 not to be readmitted until 1655 when Cromwell allowed new Jewish settlement.

III

It is frequently argued because there was no Jewish community to form the target of anti-Semitism at the time when Marlowe and Shakespeare wrote, that The Jew of Malta and The Merchant of Venice cannot be racist. Not only does this ignore the causal relationship between anti-Semitic propaganda and anti-Semitic violence, but it overlooks the importance of the titles of the plays themselves. Each of Marlowe's other major plays gravitates dramatically around a main character. It is no accident that the titles of the plays conform with this notion of a central protagonist: Tamburlaine, Dr Faustus, Edward II, as does his poem, Hero and Leander. The reason I think that this play is not called Barabas is because Marlowe is much more interested in exploiting a stereotype of Jewishness than exploring an individual. The title page of the 1633 Quarto edition

---

75 In fact, despite the expulsion order, there was certainly a rump Jewish population, though its size remains a matter of conjecture. The number was swelled by Marranos, Jews who had fled from the Inquisition. The size of the Jewish population is difficult to determine, since they usually professed to being Christian and only secretly observed Jewish ritual.
actually calls the play The Famous Tragedy of the Rich Jew of Malta. Barabas, it assures us in McDiamid’s words, is ‘as Jewish’ as we could want him. This preference for labelling Barabas a Jew before portraying him as a fully characterised individual is born out by the play. Machevil says that he is come ‘to present the tragedy of a Jew’ but never names him. Later in the first scene, Barabas instructs the merchant to pay the customs duties with his credit. Significantly he is the Jew of Malta before he is Barabas: ‘Go tell ’em the Jew of Malta sent thee, man; / Tush, who amongst ’em knows not Barabas?’ (I. ii. 66 - 67). Abigail throws herself at the feet of the Abbess and identifies herself as ‘The hopeless daughter of a hapless Jew / the Jew of Malta, wretched Barabas’ (I. ii. 316 - 317). In the title and repeatedly throughout the play, Barabas is a rich Jew before a man, a merchant, a bourgeois figure, even a father. Greenblatt notes the process of ‘de-individual[isation]’ that occurs in respect of Marlowe’s protagonist: ‘Most dramatic characters - Shylock is the appropriate example - accumulate identity in the course of their play; Barabas loses it.’

Shakespeare’s title is similarly intriguing. Despite the widespread contempt for usury and the anti-Semitism that it frequently spawned, The Merchant of Venice, as we have seen, is not infrequently considered to be a comedy - albeit, concessionally, a problem comedy. This certainly seems to have been the case in the Renaissance. On the title page of the 1600 Quarto, the play is entitled The comicall History of the Merchant of Venice and two years earlier, Francis Meres had grouped the play with other more straightforwardly recognisable comedies such as ‘his Gentlemen of Verona, his Errors, his Loues labors lost [and the tantalising] Loue labours wonne’. For Stephen Gosson however, these plays were not straightforward entertainment. In his The School of Abuse

---

76 Learning to Curse, p. 49.
77 Palladia Tamia, 0o 2°.
he mentions a play which must have formed a source, or at least provided a model, for The Jew of Malta and The Merchant of Venice, The Jew ... shewne at the Bull, ... represent[s] the greedinesse of worldly chusers, and bloody mindes of Usurers*. 78 I have written above of what I called the conspiratorial or consensual nature of the titles of Shakespeare's comedies. 79 Shakespeare's tragedies, which are essentially about the isolation of an individual, the impossibility of his (Shakespeare is usually only interested in male protagonists) integration in his community, have titles that foreground a single individual against a usually hostile social group: Hamlet, Othello, King Lear, Macbeth. Even Antony and Cleopatra while it stresses the closeness of the main characters suggests their inability to conduct their relationship in terms of a wider human community. The Merchant of Venice is a curious exception. It appears to offer a single protagonist and isolate him/her against the background of a city - a fixed and identifiable social group. But who is the merchant? Antonio, whose mercantile success and failure forms the rise and fall structure of the play, Shylock to whose fiscal passions the play pays such close attention, or even Portia who, when she intervenes in the court, displays an acute awareness of Venetian economic and legal structures? The drama never really tells us and perhaps this is why the play, which has traditionally been labelled a comedy, with its bald racism, homophobia and threat to cut out lumps of living flesh, sits so uneasily in this category. In the words of Kiernan Ryan, the text stages 'a rebellion against the expectations of its own title'. 80 In a rather prosaic programme note, for Peter Hall's production, Barbara Everett states that 'The Merchant of the Play's title is Antonio...' If this is the case, one wonders why Shakespeare (of whose 37 plays 23 contain or consist of names) did not title the play after its protagonist. Moreover, this 78 Stephen Gosson, The School of Abuse, edited by Edward Arber (London, 1868), p. 140. The play Gosson mentions is too early for either of our plays, since his Abuse was published in 1579. The Jew of Malta is usually dated around 1589 and The Merchant of Venice 1596.

---

79 See chapter II above.

quirky misgiving was given particular emphasis by Peter Hall's Merchant, because what it rightly urged us to recognise was that all the characters are in their own ways business adventurers: Antonio, Bassanio, Shylock, and Portia. First and foremost this was a production about money. When Gobbo shifted his allegiance from Shylock to Lorenzo, he swaggered on in his new livery; everyone in this Venice aspired to be upwardly mobile. When the play is first mentioned in the Stationer's Register on 22 July 1598, it appears as A boke of the Marchaunt of Venyce or otherwise called the Iewe of Venyce.
The fact that the play has two alternative titles perhaps indicates that we are required to puzzle, rather more than Everett suggests, over the identity of its protagonist. It also acknowledges its debt to Marlowe's play and it is to the nature of this debt that I now wish to turn.

Although the precise quantification of this debt is impossible to determine, it is generally acknowledged that Shakespeare's play stems from that of Marlowe. Recently a critic wrote: 'without Marlowe's Jew of Malta it is hard to see how Shakespeare could have created The Merchant of Venice. The one play overlays the other.' 81 James Shapiro advances the tantalising thesis that Shakespeare may have acted in The Jew of Malta in the early 1590s. 82 This would certainly account for the extraordinary influence of Marlowe's play. Traditional criticism sees Marlowe as John the Baptist to the Shakespearean Messiah. But although there is little doubt that the Bard's eventual achievements outshine those of his prophet, it should be remembered that by the year of his death (1593), Marlowe had effectively appropriated and interpreted blank verse and fully recognised the extent of its dramatic potentialities (as the closing speech of

---

81 Maurice Charney, 'Jessica's Turquoise Ring and Abigail's Poisoned Porridge: Shakespeare and Marlowe as Rivals and 82 James Shapiro, 'Which is The Merchant here and which The Jew?: Shakespeare and the Economics of Influence',
Dr Faustus illustrates). By that year, Shakespeare had written only one tragedy, Titus Andronicus and his verse was not yet fully responding to the dynamics of ordinary speech. Of Marlowe's death in a pub brawl, Kenneth Muir wryly states, 'it could be said that the most important event in Shakespeare's career took place in Eleanor Bull's tavern at Deptford. For the next few years, Shakespeare was without serious rival.' Maurice Charney echoes this: 'By the time Marlowe was killed ... his accomplishments at age 29 were considerably greater than those of Shakespeare at age 29.' 83

In terms of their plots, the two plays are indeed alike. In each an isolated Jew exists within a morally dubious Christian society. Through the interrelated themes of wealth, political power and geographical range, the plays explore the racial tensions that such a relationship throws up. In both cases, the Jew is accompanied by a servant who either leaves him (in the case of Gobbo), or betrays him (Ithamore). The Jews' family is represented by a single daughter and in both cases the desire of this daughter to marry 'out' causes a rift between generations. The final come-uppance takes place in the teeth of political triumph - Barabas has been given the governorship of Malta and victory over Ferneze, while the Duke and Portia have granted Shylock's legal suit. Barabas is physically destroyed, while Shylock's humiliation, compulsory religious conversion, and confiscation of his property, represents a fate worse than death to him:

Nay, take my life and all, pardon not that.
You take my house when you do take the prop
That doth sustain my house; you take my life
When you do take the means whereby I live.

(IV. i. 369 - 372)

83 Chamey, 'Jessica's Turquoise Ring', p. 33.
The differences between the plays might seem to be even more spectacular. Structurally for instance, Marlowe's play has no alternative setting that corresponds to Shakespeare's Belmont, it has no subplot corresponding to the confusion over the rings. But more important is the difference between the dramaturgies of the plays signified in the alternative titles of Shakespeare's play: The Jew of Venyce / The Marchaunt of Venyce.

Near the beginning of Marlowe's play, Barabas describes his fleet:

```
I hope my ships
I sent for Egypt and the bordering isles
Are gotten up by Nilus' winding banks:
Mine argosy from Alexandria,
Loaden with spice and silks, now under sail,
Are smoothly gliding down by Candy shore
To Malta, through our Mediterranean sea.
```

(I. i. 41 - 47)

The Jew of Malta and the merchant of Malta are the same person. In Shakespeare's play, the argosies that come 'From Tripolis, from Mexico, and England, / From Lisbon, Barbary, and India' (III. ii. 270 - 71) do not belong to Shylock. If Everett is right that the eponymous merchant is Antonio (and most of the play's commentators agree with her), then Shakespeare has refocussed the structure of Marlowe's play and the actions of the Jew become contingent upon those of his society as a whole. Barabas is largely successful in maintaining his autonomy. He has no loyalties and therefore has no friends. He splits off his enemies and enflames their mutual hatred turning Turk against Christian and betraying Christian to Turk. He repeatedly uses the device of role-playing, disguising himself as a French lute player, feigning death, pretending to lament his loss of wealth (when in fact he has already taken the precaution of hiding coins under a floorboard in preparation for such a seizure), and publicly scorning his daughter's mock-apostasy to enable her to recover his booty. Moreover, Barabas is quite prepared to betray the trust of his fellow Jews. Debating their corporate action in the face of their unreasonable financial burden, Barabas assures them 'If anything shall there concern our state, / Assure yourselves I'll look - unto myself [Aside]' (I. i. 171 - 2). On the one hand as we have seen, Barabas is identified by others as a Jew. In terms of his self-identification however, he is without racial obligation. He is convinced of his personal superiority: 'Barabas is ... framed of finer mould than common men' (I. ii. 219 - 220), and again in the Jews' company, he confides in the audience that 'However the world go, I'll make sure for one'. Marx notes that 'In their relations as a class, the bourgeoisie act together, but in relation to each other their interests are opposed.' This exactly sums up Barabas's relation to those of his religion in Malta: a selective loyalty unashamedly articulated and ruthless in its self-interest. Shylock on the other hand is solidly and faithfully Jewish. Although he does not have the money himself, he is confident that 'Tubal, a wealthy Hebrew of my tribe, / Will furnish me' (I. iii. 52 - 53). One is tempted to suggest that had Shylock approached Barabas for the loan, the latter would have pretended to have been out! Marlowe's Jew is the merchant of the play; Shakespeare's is not and thus The Merchant of Venice, comprises a much more complex web of sociality than Marlowe's play. In the words of Arthur Humphreys, Antonio 'is the centre on which the lines of force converge, not (like Barabas) that from which they originate'.

The other fundamental difference between the plays emerges in the attitude towards religious faith in Venice and Malta. In Bill Alexander's 1987 version of The Merchant, Antonio was dragged into the court room with his arms outstretched on a horizontal plank. Shylock washed his hands, chanted ritualistically and put on a religious shawl.

---

The scene was plainly meant to allude to the Pharisees demanding the death of Christ. In any case, Shylock is about to perform a holy sacrifice rather than a murder. This version of the courtroom scene certainly fits with the seriousness with which Shylock regards his religion. James C. Bulman points out that Sher's performance, especially in the trial scene was redolent of 'fundamentalist' religions unassimilated by the West:

Sher's Shylock invoked the image of such alien and often misunderstood peoples, ignorance of whose traditions and values all too readily has led to racial prejudice. His behaviour at the trial played on audiences' fears of religious fanaticism, the blood ritual recalling not Judaism, but the vengeful outbursts of an ayatollah bent on destroying the Great Satan - and settling for the heart of Salman Rushdie. 86

Shylock is certainly firm in his religious observance as Barabas would never be. He tells Bassanio that he will not eat pork and furthermore that he must forego Christian company during the most sacramental phases of his daily life: 'I will not eat with you, drink with you, nor pray with you' (I. iii. 32). He is, as we have seen, loyal to other Jews, and desirous that Jessica should marry one. He is familiar with the Old Testament and cites the story of Jacob tending Laban's sheep to Antonio. In the court room scene, Shylock imbues his 'bond' with the vehemence of religiosity: 'And by our holy Sabbath have I sworn / To have the due and forfeit of my bond.' (IV. i. 36 - 37). 87

In contrast, Barabas's pursuit of his religion is conducted in line with Machevil's opinion expressed in the prologue: 'I count religion but a childish toy, / And hold there is no sin but ignorance' (II. 14 - 15). In The Prince, Machiavelli had insisted upon the cultivation, in the absence of religious conviction, of a religious persona:

87 'Due' appears in the trial scene four times. It is most likely an unfortunate pun drawing together Shylock's religion and his ruthless litigiousness. Note especially 'Three thousand ducats, due unto the Jew' (IV. i. 411).
it is not necessary for a prince to have all of the above mentioned qualities, [wisdom, goodness, piety, honour] but it is very necessary for him to appear to have them. Furthermore, I shall be so bold as to assert this: that having them and practising them at all times is harmful; and appearing to have them is useful; for instance, to seem merciful, faithful, humane, trustworthy, religious ... And it is essential to understand this: that a prince, and especially a new prince, cannot observe all those things for which men are considered good, for in order to maintain the state he is often obliged to act against his promise, against charity, against humanity and against religion. 88

Barabas tells his daughter that it is morally acceptable to disguise herself as a nun ‘for religion / Hides many mischiefs from suspicion’ (I. ii. 281 - 282). Everybody on Malta works out their intricate machinations under the guise of religious protestation. Femeze justifies the burden of the tax on the grounds that the guilt of the Jews has somehow brought it about in the first place:

... through our sufferance of your hateful lives,
Who stand accursed in the sight of heaven,
These taxes and afflictions are befallen,
And therefore thus we are determined:
Read there the articles of our decrees.

(I. ii. 63 - 67)

The running smut about the lewd behaviour of the nuns and the friars, which is confirmed when Bernadine laments that Abigail has died a virgin (III. vi. 41), makes a mockery of the celibacy of Catholic orders. Elsewhere the ironies of religious hypocrisy are even more trenchant. Ithamore remarks that 'To undo a Jew is charity, and not sin' (IV. iv. 80) and Barabas tells Jessica that 'It's no sin to deceive a Christian' (II. iii. 311). Paradoxically neither of them seems aware of the religious vocabulary that they are using. Again, Femeze tells Barabas that the impounding of his goods will have the effect of sparing those of his countrymen:

we take particularly thine
To save the ruin of a multitude:
And better one want for a common good
Than many perish for a private man.

(I. ii. 97 - 100)

This is of course a reworking of the advice of Caiaphas who in John 11. 50 urges the Pharisees to recognise that: 'it is expedient for vs, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not.'

As religion is transmuted into a smoke-screen for political manipulation, so relationships, both familial and marital, mask a sinister interest in financial vitality. The notion of maintaining a Jewish lineage is, as we would expect, of greater importance to Shylock than Barabas. Jessica's father is plainly worried about the bad influence of witnessing Christian over-indulgence. As he leaves her on the night of the masque, he warns her to

Lock up my doors, and when you hear the drum,
And the vile squealing of the wry-neck'd fife,
Clamber not you up to the casements then,
Nor thrust your head into the public street
To gaze on Christian fools with varnish'd faces.

(II. v. 28 - 32)

His contempt for Christian foppery is clear as is his desire to keep her away from the licence of carnival. The family tradition is crucial to Shylock and his daughter's virginity is its prerequisite. The Jewish marriage is supposed to take place to another of the same religion. Shylock foregrounds his frustration in the court-room: 'I have a daughter - /
Would any of the stock of Barrabus / Had been her husband, rather than a Christian!' (IV. i. 290 - 292). Similarly, Barabas tells his daughter, 'Are there not Jews enow in Malta, /
But thou must dote upon a Christian?' (II. iii. 361 - 362). Semitic marriage is intended to promulgate the race and the choice of a Jewish husband is the father's prerogative; the apparent lottery of Portia's betrothal would never do. The reproductive potency of the Jews contrasts sharply with the familial chaos of the Christians. When, more through luck than design, Bassanio ends up with Portia (and Gratiano with Nerissa, which is of course contingent on the success of Bassanio's choice of casket), the union is instantly ruptured by the necessity of returning to Venice to the aid of Antonio:

First go with me to church and call me wife,
And then away to Venice to your friend;
For never shall you lie by Portia's side
With an unquiet soul....
My maid Nerissa and myself meantime
Will live as maids and widows.

(III. ii. 305 - 311)

The subsequent confusion over the rings and the mock infidelities of Portia and Nerissa, who claim to have slept with the lawyer and his assistant, shroud with comic complexity the Christian sacrament of marriage. Problems of love rather than lineage dog these romantic ventures. Shylock's conception of marriage seems much more straightforward: the immortality of his race is what counts. Relating the story from Genesis, in which Jacob induced the conception of spotted lambs by placing coloured rods in front of the 'woolly breeders', Shylock concludes, 'thrift is blessing if men steal it not.' Antonio asks him the point of the anecdote: 'Was this inserted to make interest good? / Or is your gold and silver ewes and rams?' (I. iii. 89 - 90) Shylock replies sagely, 'I cannot tell; I make it breed as fast.' The ewes/use/iues pun is at work again: Shylock means that his familial and financial potency is assured. This mercenary attitude to social relationships is not monopolised totally by Shylock though. Bassanio understands the monetary advantages of marrying Portia. He tells Antonio quite unashamedly that through marrying her, he will 'get clear of all the debts I owe' (I. i. 134) and his description of her beauty is ruthlessly materialistic: 'her sunny locks / Hang on her temples like a golden fleece ... / And many Jasons come in quest of her' (I. i. 169 - 172). Later Gratiano tactlessly blurts out this pastoral acquisitiveness in front of their new wives: 'We are the Jasons, we have won the fleece.' (III. ii. 243). It is in the light of this ovine metaphor that we should understand Antonio's reference to himself as a 'tainted wether of the flock'. The unmarried, and conventionally homosexual merchant images himself as a castrated ram. It is thus no surprise that Shylock's anecdote, in which siring offspring is a guarantee of economic and social advancement, is incomprehensible to Antonio. Far from viewing money with its Aristotelian associations of sterility and barrenness, Shylock regards it as teeming. Moreover, its fecundity is not unrelated to his own sexual prowess. It is Antonio, in Shylock's scheme of things, that is sterile - in his homosexuality. The merchant is not a ewe[surer], but a wether.

Portia and Jessica are both financially sound propositions. When Jessica deserts her father, Shylock laments the loss of his fortune as much as the loss of his daughter:

Two thousand ducats in that, and other precious, precious jewels. I would my daughter were dead at my foot, and the jewels in her ear; would she were hears'd at my foot and the ducats in her coffin!

(III. i. 74)

Jessica has stolen not only his ducats, but his 'two stones' (II. viii. 20). She has taken his jewels, but also, as she is his only heir, she has deprived him of his lineage; she has metaphorically castrated him - stones was the Renaissance slang for 'testicles'. His money, his jewels, his daughter and metaphorically his lineage are lost; but more serious than all of these is the disqualification from Jewish worship. According to Deuteronomy

---

89 On Antonio's homophobic homosexuality, see Seymour Kleinburg, 'The Merchant of Venice: The Homosexual as Anti-Semite in Nascent Capitalism', in Literary Visions of Homosexuality, edited by Stuart Kellogg (New York, 1983), 113 - 126, p. 120.

90 Other examples of this usage occur in Shakespeare's plays. In The Merry Wives of Windsor, Caius tells Simple in advance of the duel that he 'will cut all his [Hugh's] two stones' (I. iv. 107). In the RSC 1992 production of the play, this meaning was made explicit as Caius placed his sword between Simple's legs and withdrew it on the line. In Romeo and Juliet, as the Nurse reminisces about the fall of the baby Juliet, she remarks that she had a 'bump [on her brow] as big as a cockerel's stone' (I. iii. 53)!
23. 1, 'Hee that is wounded in the stones, or hath his priuie member cut off, shall not enter into the Congregation of the LORD'. As Jessica steals away from her father's house with his stones, she abnegates her own sexuality by disguising herself as a boy. As she 'gild[s]' herself (II. vi. 49), so she gelds both herself and her father. Children and money are of course identical for the patriarch. As Shakespeare puts it elsewhere, 'Twas nothing to geld a codpiece of a purse' (The Winter's Tale, IV. iv. 612). Gratiano does not realise how close to the truth he is when he wishes that the judge's clerk 'were gelt that had it, for my part' (V. i. 144).

The physical and emotional are bonded on to the financial; as Portia tells her new husband, 'Since you are dear bought, I will love you dear' (III. ii. 315), while Antonio too associates his money with the very physicality of his love, telling Bassanio, 'My purse, my person, my extremest means, / Lie all unlock'd to your occasions' (I. i. 138 - 139). It is of course Portia's portion (the Renaissance term for a dowry) which attracts Bassanio to her and is offered in lieu of his friend's life. Her whole estate is surrendered to him as is her body - Belmont, or the 'beautiful mountain' of the mons veneris - in Portia's equivalent of the purse/person analogy that Antonio had employed: 'Myself, and what is mine, to you and yours / Is now converted' (III. ii. 166).

---

91 This line is itself a tissue of puns and double entendres. Nothing means 'no thing [penis]' therefore 'vagina' and purse is slang for a 'scrotum' (see David Willbem, 'Shakespeare's Nothing', in Representing Shakespeare: New Psychoanalytic Essays, edited by Murray M. Schwartz and Coppelia Kahn (Baltimore and London, 1980), 244 - 263; also Shakespeare's Bawdy, edited by Eric Partridge (London and New York, 1968), first published 1947.)

92 The formulation 'purse and person' is undoubtedly sexual. When Falstaff is reprimanded for exploiting Quickly financially and sexually, the Lord Chief Justice sternly remarks, 'You have, as it appears to me, practised upon the easy-yielding spirit of this woman, and made her serve your uses both in purse and in person.' (II Henry IV, II. i. 115.)

94 Lawrence Normand, 'Reading the body in The Merchant of Venice', Textual Practice, 5 (1991), 55 - 73, p. 70.
In the fiercely materialistic world of Marlowe's play, a world in which bodies are value and slaves literally have their price written on their backs, everybody is worth something. When Abigail rescues her father's coins, his rapturous jubilation oscillates between daughter and money: 'O girl, O gold, O beauty, O my bliss!' (II. i. 54). Later, Barabas tells Lodowick that his daughter will be a diamond for his delectation and possession. Personal integrity is continually reified, every man - and even more so, woman - has his/her price. In the course of his mock conversion, Barabas describes himself as 'a covetous wretch, / That would for lucre's sake have sold my soul.' (IV. i. 52 - 53). Later, when Dr Faustus finally does part with his soul, a written credit note has replaced hard cash.

IV

If they're black, send them back; if they're yids, kill their kids. 95

At its extreme the voracious materialism of the English Renaissance, which we have seen shadowed in these plays, expresses the aspirations of an age which is beginning to find its capitalistic feet, an age which is reliant upon the gold and silver provided by the Jews. These plays are both situated on the fault line between an economy of ready cash and credit balances; they dramatise what James Shapiro has recently called 'a cultural identity crisis'. 96 The anti-Semitism that they contain is symptomatic of their particular historical position and the economic revolution taking place at the time of their composition. They are thus, mercifully, historically specific. As Jean-Marie Maguin writes:

96 Shapiro, Shakespeare and the Jews, p. 8.
Transposed in a period following the curse of Nazism, the act of composing such a play would be inexcusable. The Jew of Malta performed in modern dress would be, at the very least, a dangerous blunder. 97

T. S. Eliot's modern version of The Merchant of Venice tragically gives the lie to Maguin's benevolent assumption that such racism is dead and buried. Eliot virulently reanimates exactly the same kinds of anti-Semitism that we have witnessed in these four-hundred-year-old plays:

A lustreless protrusive eye
Stares from the protozoic slime
At a perspective of Canaletto.
The smoky candle end of time
Declines. On the Rialto once.
The rats are underneath the piles.
The Jew is underneath the lot.
Money in furs. 98

At the time of writing the warring factions in the former Yugoslavia are accusing one another of operating ghoulish policies of 'ethnic cleansing'. The term has passed rather too readily into the language and can be heard nightly on TV news and read in the papers without the cautionary quotation marks. A fascistic ethnocentricity has emerged backed up by torture and extermination camps the like of which the world may not have seen for more than half a century.

In the wake of the present attacks on asylum seekers in the former East Germany, German Jews are fearing 'a seismic shift to the right when the next elections are held'. 99

In precisely the same way as those of twenties and thirties Germany, the economic and social problems (caused in this instance by the transition to a Western market economy) are expressing themselves in popular racism. Of the storming of the Rostock shelter, one reporter noted:

Several hundred bystanders egged on the rioters, shouting "Germany for the Germans". "If you want to call me a Nazi, call me a Nazi," one red-cheeked citizen said, adding that it was a good thing that the radicals' violent protests had succeeded in moving the 200 asylum-seekers to the outskirts of the east German port.

'Yesterday, little boys playing on the lawn outside the burnt-out hostel ... gave Nazi salutes like those they had seen in the past few days.' In the teeth of the accusation that the German police had deliberately withdrawn to allow the rioters free-reign and thus provide the government with an imperative for tightening immigration controls, the head of German counter-intelligence announced on the 30 August 1992, the setting up of a special unit to monitor right-wing violence. What is clear amid all of this injustice and accusation is that social problems are being projected onto refugees who are finding themselves in a position which increasingly resembles that of the Jew in pre-war Germany.

Now, more than ever, it is time to divest the Marlovian and Shakespearean texts of their complacent and commonplace defences. As spectators, critics and students of these plays, it is our responsibility to ensure that their continued dissemination is accompanied by an awareness of their historical specificity and their racist potentialities.

---

102 The Guardian, 31 August 1992. A letter published in the same edition notes that, 'The Rostock chief of Police apparently went home to bed while the hostel burnt and rioters roamed the streets.'
VIII

Playing with Boys

Homoeroticism and All-Male Companies in Shakespearean Drama

Rance: Was the girl killed before or after you took her clothes off?
Prentice: He wasn't a girl. He was a man.
Mrs Prentice: He was wearing a dress.
Prentice: He was a man for all that.
Rance: Women wear dresses, Prentice, not men. I won't be a party to the wanton destruction of a fine old tradition. ¹

Come, gentle Ganymede, and play with me ²

The project of 'Social Shakespeare' has been throughout to examine ways in which the social and dramatic structures of Shakespeare's plays may have a bearing on contemporary social and dramatic practice. This means that the criticism is of necessity socially engaged and unashamedly self-conscious of this fact. In respect of this chapter, that means that before attempting an exploration of the complexities surrounding the figure of the boy actor, it will be necessary to clarify some of the implications of such an endeavour and its possible effects.

Shakespeare's privileged position at the centre of our cultural currency is beyond contention (see the following chapter on 'Shakemyth' for a fuller discussion of this). Homosexuality however, is far from dominant and is subject always to the hegemonic pressures of heterosexuality. The Local Government Act of 1988 is an instance of this state-sponsored oppression of 'deviant' sexualities. Under Section 28 of the act, a local authority may neither 'intentionally promote homosexuality or publish material with the intention of promoting homosexuality' nor 'promote the teaching in any maintained school of the acceptability of homosexuality as a pretended family relationship.' There is an obvious tension between the desire of the State to erect its cultural totems around the figure of the Bard and the suggestion that Renaissance theatre, in its wholesale transvestism, utilised a form of dramatic representation which (according to its contemporary opponents) promoted homosexuality. Indeed in his enthusiasm for dressing boys as girls and having them pretend to be boys, Shakespeare seems to be somewhat vague about the 'correct' identification of the two sexes and deliberately to undermine the heterosexual erotic practice founded upon it. Perish the thought that Shakespeare himself might be liable for prosecution under Section 28!

At stake then in any discussion of Renaissance representations of homoeroticism are ideological questions about 'High Culture' reified in the figure of the playwright. As Simon Shepherd notes, 'Discussion of homosexuality in Shakespear seems to be motivated not by an interest in Renaissance sexuality but by Shakespeare's national status. Criticism's task is to discover a fitting sexuality for the National Bard.' The most obvious symptom of this appropriation of Shakespeare for a heterosexually ordered society is a critical embarrassment in the face of textual and dramatic practices which are homoerotic at least in implication. Gwyn Williams's Person and Persona is typical of this:

---

> It could have been his nearness to a homosexual experience, coupled with acquaintanceship with homosexuals, which gave Shakespeare the sympathy he shows for them in his works. ⁴

This is literary criticism at its most blinkered and offensive. Firstly, it is spuriously based on the sexual orientation of Shakespeare himself - a personal quality which is entirely unknowable. Secondly, by stating that Shakespeare is 'near' a homosexual experience, it implies that he retains some distance from it and thus remains 'untainted' by it. Thirdly, by showing sympathy 'for them in his works' both Bard and critic are placed safely on the other side of the divide extending their indulgent compassion and understanding to those poor queers. The normative suggestion has all the clumsy intentionality of the statement: 'Some of Shakespeare's best friends were gay'! Later in his discussion of Antonio in The Merchant of Venice, Williams compounds his critical embarrassment: 'Like the other Antonio [in Twelfth Night], he has nothing effeminate about him, and his only fault in our eyes may be his early anti-semitism.' ⁵ The logic of the grammar implies first that it is a 'fault' to be effeminate and moreover that effeminacy equals homosexuality. If Williams is dismissive of homosexuality in this way, it should come as no surprise that his attitude towards anti-Semitism is less than rigorous. Antonio is guilty, according to Williams, of this prejudice early in the play but the suggestion is that we should acquit him as he has reformed his ways. I would offer as a counter-argument the vituperative racist abuse during the borrowing scene as well as the overwhelming injustice of the final court scene. No-one here, least of all Antonio has repented of their early anti-Semitism; the state's final 'justice' is founded upon it. 6

---

Williams's attitude towards homosexuality is at best patronising and unconsciously reproduces the most stale and damaging stereotypes about homosexuality (not to mention Jewishness). The outstanding assumption of criticism like that of Williams is that, simply, heterosexuality is a better state of affairs, a superior condition to homosexuality. In the wake of Freud, it is difficult nowadays not to see the process of maturation as a 'development' from narcissism and same-sex eroticism to adult heterosexuality. In short, homoerotic experience is eclipsed and occluded by an erotic practice predicated on the successful reproduction of the social order as prescribed in state apparatuses such as the church, education (Section 28), and the media. 7 As Valerie Traub puts it, 'the erotic body is a material site for inscriptions of ideology and power. Dominant social formations not only manipulate but produce erotic desire through ideological and institutional means.' 8 Ideologically, in western capitalistic societies, 'het' is the way to be. 9

The consequence of this for literary criticism and more especially for a discussion of Renaissance erotic practices as realised in the drama of the period is that, as in the example from Williams, any homoerotic complexities and tensions in the literary text are in effect edited to provide a prescriptive version of a social organisation hospitable to the morality of market capitalism; what Joseph A. Porter calls 'the canonisation of

---

6 For a more extended discussion of this play and the question of anti-Semitism, see chapter VII.
7 The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith expressed the view of the Catholic Church in its latest report on homosexuality prepared for the bishops of America. It calls homosexuality an 'intemperance of the flesh' and sets out certain conditions, such as 'the recruitment of teachers and servicemen' wherein it is right to discriminate against homosexuals. (The Guardian, 31 July 1992.)
9 In a letter to The Guardian, Judi Clements, the National Director of MIND notes that 'The diagnosis of "homosexuality" was dropped from the standard classification of psychiatric disorders [as recently as] 1973. Since then the practice of aversion therapy to "cure" homosexuality has been cut back. But unfortunately 20 years has not been sufficient to make mental health professionals catch up with the change.' (28 July 1992, p. 18.)
heterosexuality'. It is with an awareness of as well as a hostility to the political ramifications of this crude reductionism that this chapter attempts to explore the complexities of the representation of homoerotic relationships on the Renaissance and the modern stages and to consider the dramaturgical consequences of the playing of female characters by young males. In this sense the 'playing' of my title is both an invitation to indulge eroticly and a technical term signifying 'acting'.

II

It is a testament to the non-canonicity of homosexuality that, despite some recent articles on its relationship to the literature of the early modern period, there remains only one major book-length study on the subject of Homosexuality in Renaissance England. In fact, some commentators, in the wake of Foucault's work on the history of sexuality, assert the improbability of the existence of homosexuality in any recognisable form at all in this period. Simon Shepherd contends that 'Elizabethan culture had no conception of "homosexuality" as a positive form of sexuality in its own right'. Christopher Hill is even more emphatic: 'There was no homo-sexual subculture' in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century England. And Alan Bray, whose ground-breaking socio-historical study opened up the territory as a site of historical debate warns against the inapposite

11 It is with these senses that Everard Guilpin puns on the word in his epigram, 'Of Issa: 'Issa from me to a player tooke her way, / No Meruaile, for she alwaies lou'd to play:' Skialetheia or A shadowe of Truth, in certaine Epigrams and Satyres (London, 1598), B 4^.
application of modern sexual terminology to a period as historically distant as the Renaissance:

To talk of an individual in this period as being or not being a 'homosexual' is an anachronism and ruinously misleading... the terms in which we now speak of homosexuality cannot readily be translated into those of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. 15

Bray's study maintains that the molly houses (equivalents to modern gay clubs) of the late seventeenth- and early eighteenth-centuries were the first indication of an emergent homosexual culture. These, he argues, were regularly purged not because of the sexual practices that they fostered but because the 'society of the molly houses did not follow class lines but rather tended to dissolve them. It did so because it was not mediated by existing social forms, of class or otherwise: it was set along side them, a social institution in its own right.' 16 In other words, the threat of the molly house had less to do with the apparent 'perversions' of homoeroticism than the heterogeneous mixture of different social classes which used them. As Bray notes, 'What determined the shared and recurring features of homosexual relationships was the prevailing distribution of power, economic power and social power, not the fact of homosexuality itself.' 17

Bray of course is not suggesting that homoeroticism per se did not exist, rather that a perception of it as being a constituent of a distinct and distinctly 'other' kind of erotic modality was not available to the Renaissance. However, despite the widespread currency of the proposal that the early modern period was unable to recognise and certainly reluctant to prosecute homosexuality, a reading of the literature of the period 15 Bray, Homosexuality in Renaissance England, p. 16.

16 Ibid., p. 86.
17 Ibid., p 56.
demonstrates that homoerotic sentiments were neither as rare nor as invisible as this thesis might suggest. Richard Barnfield's 'The Teares of an affectionate Shepherd sicke for Loue or The Complaint of Daphnis for the Loue of Ganimede' is unabashed in its homoerotic promise:

If it be sinne to loue a sweet-fac'd Boy,
(Whose amber locks trust vp in golden tramels
Dangle adowne his louely cheekes with ioy,
When pearle and flowers his faire haiie enamels)
If it be sinne to loue a louely Lad;
Oh then sinne I, for whom my soule is sad.

... Why doo thy Corall lips disdaine to kisse,
And suck that Sweete, which manie haue desired?
That Baulme my Bane, that meanes would mend my misse
Oh let me then with thy sweete Lips b'inspired;
When thy Lips touch my Lips, my Lips will tume
To Corall too, and being cold yce will burne. 18

Despite the vehemence of this poetry, Bray is most reluctant to acknowledge that it constitutes an example of homosexual writing. He maintains that 'These poems have a good deal of charm ... but there is no reason to think that they are [anything but] literary exercises. Like other self-consciously classical poetry of this kind they were the product of a literary genre which (if it was more than a mere exercise) was about friendship, the "insensible part" of love, not sexuality but a Platonic meeting of minds. It was not about homosexuality.' 19 In support of this somewhat surprising assertion, Bray notes that Barnfield's commonplace book contains erotic writing which is 'both robustly pornographic and entirely heterosexual.' 20 In citing the commonplace book, Bray constructs a classification of literary genres more or less genuine than others which, as a 18 Richard Barnfield, Poems 1594 - 1598, edited by Edward Arber (Birmingham, 1883), pp. 5, 15.

19 Homosexuality, p. 61.
20 Ibid., p. 61.
critical practice, seems both tangential and spurious. Whether or not Barnfield's other writing is heterosexual, the assertion that 'The Teares of an affectionate Shepherd' is homoerotic (irrespective of its being a literary imitation of Vergil's second eclogue) seems undeniable. It may well be that the comparative obscurity of Barnfield's work is itself a symptom of the heterosexist bias of literary commentators and the institutions that support them. Certainly, Joseph Pequigney in his recent analysis of Shakespeare's Sonnets is incensed by what he considers to be the effective censorship that Barnfield has suffered at the hands of a heterosexist literary establishment. Of Barnfield's Certain Sonnets he notes dryly:

One might have thought that the other Elizabethan sequence that also treats of love for a youthful master-mistress would have received attention - even particular attention - in the vast output of the Shakespearean commentators. Instead, Barnfield is a dirty little skeleton to be kept in the closet, while insistent and exaggerated claims are advanced for the concept of 'Renaissance friendship'.

Barnfield is not alone in constituting a counter-example to the assertion that homosexuality was unrecognisable in the Renaissance. John Donne's cynical 'Satire I' mentions intercourse with 'thy plump muddy whore, or prostitute boy' (l. 40) and in a poem that warns his mistress not to follow him on his foreign journey in the guise of a page, he notes that her male disguise would incite 'Th' indifferent Italian [to] haunt thee, with such lust and hideous rage / As Lot's fair guests were vexed' (ll. 38 - 40). Ben

---

21 For the homoerotic model of the second eclogue, see Byrne R. S. Fone, 'The Other Eden: Arcadia and the Homosexual Imagination', in Literary Visions of Homosexuality, edited by Stuart Kellogg (New York, 1985), pp. 13 - 34.

Jonson is caustic about the sexual intemperance of his poetic equivalent of Sir Epicure Mammon, the wonderfully named Sir Voluptuous Beast who disports himself with partners female, male and animal!

While Beast instructs his faire, and innocent wife,
In the past pleasures of his sensuall life,
Telling the motions of each petticote,
And how his Ganimeедe mov'd, and how his goate,
And now, her (hourely) her own cucqueane makes,
In varied shapes, which for his lust shee takes:
What doth he else, but say, leave to be chast,
Just wife, and, to change me, make womans hast. 24

In his play about the cross-gendering of male and female, Epicoene, Jonson has Truewit comment in a quite unanimated way on the life-style of Clerimont with 'his mistress abroad and his ingle at home'. 25 Everard Guilpin's Skialetheia contains ribald poems about Pollio with his 'ingles face' and 'fatte buttocke'. It goes on to satirise Licus, 'VWho is at euery play, and euery night / Sups with his Ingles.' 26

Instances of homosexuality in Shakespeare's work would include the relationships of Coriolanus and Aufidius, Antonio and Bassanio, Antonio and Sebastian, and Othello and Iago. 27 Mercutio's ribald language games and his jealous attitude towards women manifest a form of repressed homoerotic desire for Romeo. 28 In King Lear the Fool laments the proverbial inconstancy of male lovers, 'He's mad that trusts in the tameness

---

26 Skialetheia, A 8f., B 1v.
27 See for example, Coriolanus, IV. v. 115 - 127; Twelfth Night, III. iii. 4 - 13, and the extremely intense form of 'marriage' ritual that Othello and Iago undertake together, III. iii. 469 - 486. For the relationship between Antonio and Bassanio, see chapter VII.
28 For a discussion of Mercutio's homoeroticism, see chapter VI.
of a wolf, a horse's health, a boy's love, or a whore's oath' (III. vi. 18) while Thersites is less than complimentary about the intimacy between Achilles and Patroclus:

Ther: Prithee, be silent, boy; I profit not by thy talk; Thou art said to be Achilles' male varlot.

Patr: Male varlet, you rogue! What's that?

Ther: Why, his masculine whore.

(Troilus and Cressida, V. i. 13 - 16)

In assuming the name of Jove's cup-bearer and toy-boy, Rosalind is explicitly foregrounding the homoerotic dimensions of her relationship with Orlando. Her choice of this name [is appropriate] for a person who is outwardly male and inwardly female ...

The implicit associations of Ganymede [are] with girlish male beauty, transvestism, androgyny, and homosexuality'. 29 In the case of As You Like It, the very setting is a signifier of the play's homoerotic interest. The Forest of Arden is a version of pastoral and carries with it pastoral's association as a place of homoerotic activity. This is a forest of male society. When Eve appears, she does so as a slut in the shape of Audrey whose whole purpose of existence is to provide Touchstone with sexual relief and he and Jaques a talking point. Celia's pseudonym, Aliena, although adopted with the intention of reflecting her exile from court, in fact describes the position of all women in Arden. In As You Like It females appear as destructive sexual forces - as Phoebe the spiteful shepherdess or in the guise of a fatal snake ('Who with her head ... ' IV. iii. 108, my emphasis) or a predatory lioness 'with udders all drawn dry' (l. 113). A positive version of woman seems utterly to be excluded from this pastoral. The only 'woman' who intrudes is of course named in accordance with homoerotic principles. Ganymede is less a woman than a homoerotic/androgynous genius of the place. This means that Orlando is in a position to rehearse the heterosexual formulae required of a marital relationship without breaking the fundamental masculine ethos of the forest society. 30

Social Shakespeare: VIII

While the relationship between Ganymede and Orlando is something of a game (at least for Orlando), that between Cesario and Orsino is one of erotic attraction on both sides. Valentine remarks (possibly with a touch of pique) that 'If the Duke continue these favours towards you, Cesario, you are like to be much advanc'd: he hath known you but three days, and already you are no stranger' (I. iv. 1). The intimate scenes between master and servant allow the fantasy of homoerotic attraction to take place while ensuring that the final outcome is one in accordance with the requirements of the comic genre as the couple arrange to be married at the end. 31 Unlike Ganymede though, Cesario does not remove his disguise because the marriage and the assumption of female identity that it requires, are deferred beyond the end of the play. Unlike Rosalind, we never see Viola in her 'woman's weeds' (V. i. 265). Twelfth Night ends without the purgation of homosexuality that takes place in the multiple marriages dignified by Hyman's blessings at the end of As You Like It. Indeed even after Cesario has assured everyone that she is Viola, Orsino still seems to think of her as his page, addressing her as 'boy' and 'Cesario'.

To these examples of an unabashed Shakespearean homoeroticism, we might also add the obvious Marlovian instances, Gaveston, Spenser and the King in Edward II, Ganymede and Jove from Dido (see the second headnote above) and the impassioned Neptune in Hero and Leander. Perhaps the most significant homoerotic text of the period is,

30 For the pastoral as a place of homoerotic indulgence, see Fone, 'The Other Eden'.
31 For the importance of marriage to comedy, see chapter II.
However, Shakespeare's sonnet sequence. All of these examples suggest that Bray's contention - that homosexuality was unrecognisable in the Renaissance - needs refining. Although the word homosexual is an invention of the late nineteenth-century (the OED dates its first use as 1892), the concept was not as exceptional in the literature and culture of the Renaissance as Bray implies.

In his most recent work Bray maintains the absence of a distinct homosexual culture from the early modern period ('Elizabethan society was one which lacked the idea of a distinct homosexual minority'); but this article is less strident than his earlier book in its assertion that homoerotic activity was unrecognisable per se. The essay investigates the discourse of 'friendship' in the period and alerts us to the possibility of labelling male friendship erroneously as homosexuality. Bray notes a 'surprising affinity' between the concepts of friendship and sodomy and the potential for a modern misreading of the one for the other: 'the public signs of a male friendship - open to all the world to see - could be read in a different and sodomitical light from the one intended'. As an example of this, Bray instances the company of Gaveston and Edward in Marlowe's Edward II. He writes, 'the passionate language and embraces that we see between these two men have ready parallels in Elizabethan England in the daily conventions of friendship without being signs of a sodomitical relationship.' Although he later admits that 'there are in the relationship ... dark suggestions of sodomy', the desire to read this as a mere acquaintance seems, at best, obdurate. Bray's argument highlights the difficulty of disengaging the discourses of friendship from those of homoeroticism and ironically this contention is enough to undermine his confidence that the two can be separated at all.

32 For a discussion of the sonnet sequence in relation to homosexuality, see Pequigney, Such is my Love.

In the case of Montaigne's essay 'Of friendship', for example, the concept is certainly underpinned by an erotic interest. Montaigne notes that women are incapable of sustaining a relationship of such intensity as that of male sociality and then goes on to suggest that a homosocial relationship can only be intensified by physical intimacy:

the ordinary sufficiency of women cannot answer this conference and communication, the nurse of this sacred bond: nor seeme their mindes strong enough to endure the pulling of a knot so hard, so fast, and durable. And truly, if without that, such a genuine and voluntarie acquaintance might be contracted, where not only mindes had this entire jovissance, but also bodies, a share of the alliance, and where a man might wholly be engaged: It is certaine, that friendship would thereby be more compleat and full. 37

The author plainly considered this subject so risqué that he added a final paragraph in the manner of a retraction, excusing the subject by recourse to the immaturity of its earlier persona. His readers, Montaigne remarks, should 'understand that this subject was ... treated of in his infancie, only by way of exercise', and he continues with a cross between a glowing character reference and an embarrassed protest, pointing out that he was always careful

...to obey, and religiously to submit himselfe to the lawes, under which he was borne. There was never a better citizen, nor more affected to the welfare and quietnesse of his countrie, nor a sharper enemie of the changes, innovations, newfangles, and hurly-burlies of his time. 38

38 Ibid., I, p. 230.
There is no mention of Montaigne in either Bray's book or his article, but he does meekly concede that friendship may have been more than mere comradeship:

Perhaps there is always a potential ambiguity about intimacy between men. It may be so. But in Early Modern England such intimacy was peculiarly ambivalent, for the protecting conventions that ensured that it was seen in an acceptable frame of reference was often absent by the end of the sixteenth century. 39

If the difficulty in delineating friendship from homosexuality is there, might taking advantage of such indeterminacy not be a deliberate strategy of the writer? Thomas Stehling in his discussion of medieval homoerotic poetry, notes that the convention of friendship may have functioned as a vehicle through which to voice the energies of homoerotic desire: 'Love poems between men elaborated other poetic conventions; most frequently they infused the heat of passion into conventional expressions of friendship.' 40 Homoeroticism is thus encoded into a language of friendship, voicing allegorically an emotion which, if openly expressed, could have been severely punished. This is almost certainly the way to understand Montaigne's essay and may also provide useful insights into the Barnfield poems as well. 41

One final negative effect of Bray's over-cautious reluctance to concede the existence of homosexuality in the early modern period is that homosexuality itself is censored into silence; it remains a love that dare not speak its name. In the case of Shakespeare for example, the Bard is offered up as a 'full-blooded heterosexual' and the sonnets are consigned to the realms of aberration or, even worse, presented as a neutered allegorical

39 Bray, 'Homosexuality And The Signs Of Male Friendship', p. 15.
41 Incidentally, we should note in passing that, between book and article, Bray has moved the date of the emergence of a homoerotic subculture back by a hundred years.
exploration of Platonic friendship. Peter Erickson rejects this obfuscation of male-male relationships:

As applied to male ties in the plays, the terms spiritual and Platonic are ethereal and bland to the point of distorting the rich material with which we must come to grips. The spiritual explanation - or the related contention that male friendship should be understood as merely a familiar Renaissance convention that need concern us no further - treats male bonds as if they existed in a vacuum.... A spiritual emphasis cannot do justice to the psychological force and political consequences of male ties and hence minimizes or explains away their crucial importance. 42

Undoubtedly the Renaissance was permeated with a variety of sexual practices of which same-sex eroticism was merely another type. Although, as noted above, the period lacked the word homosexual, it certainly had no shortage of recently coined verbal equivalents, ganymede (1591), ingle (1592), catamite (1593) and so on. Bray's work is important in alerting us to the differences between modern and early modern ways of thinking about sexuality. An awareness of these differences is critical for an understanding of the issues raised by representations of sexuality from the past. For example, Winfried Schleiner notes the potential for anachronistic interpretation due to the enormous shift that has taken place in concepts of maleness 'over the last four centuries':

Renaissance romances contain quite a few episodes in which a male protagonist for reasons of intrigue, love stratagem, or escape from danger puts on female clothes and baffles the bystanders by his beauty, a situation quite in conflict with the male macho prototype of the hero typically presented in modern romance, whether from the screen or the newstand. 43

In its sustained stress on the historicising of social practice, Bray's work is a useful corrective to the sloppy inaccuracies represented by a transcendental category of 'the homosexual'. An example of the woeful inadequacy of such a concept is A. L. Rowse's description of the personality of Milton:

The young Milton was a pretty boy after a feminine fashion: the 'Lady of Christ's'. We cannot expect his Victorian and Victorian-minded commentators, pre-Freudians, to have any glimmering of the significance of this. Milton belonged to a recognisable feminine type who would not accept it; one has known such examples. The effect often is to over-emphasise their masculinity; it leads to a discernible psychological strain, repression, the sharpening of the senses and faculties that goes with that, the finer edge, the acridity and liability to bitterness. It is all there in Milton - a world away from William Shakespeare, the completely released, normal, masculine heterosexual. 44

This dreadful kind of normative and moralistic criticism is also flawed by its lazy and ahistorical acceptance of modes of sexual behaviour. 45 Rowse should function as a warning of what happens when definitions of erotic practice are discussed without reference to the sexual epistemology of a period which has altered significantly. Yet, at the same time, the reluctance to acknowledge a homosexuality - evident in the above literary examples - that at least resembles our own, seems perversely to refuse the possibility of making sense of the sexual past. Though there cannot be transhistorical sexual categories and thus no hetero- or homosexuality outside of each socio-historical place, the loose identification of varying forms of sexual behaviour allows one to describe and discuss interrelationships between dominant ideologies and social forms.

---

45 Rowse seems to have a monopoly on superficiality in relation to the study of sexuality in history. Simon Shepherd has recently described Rowse's Homosexuals in History as 'judicious'. (What's so funny about ladies' tailors? A survey of some male (homo)sexual types in the Renaissance', Textual Practice, 6 (1992), 17 - 30, p. 17.) Again, in an extraordinary interview published in The Sunday Times under the title of 'Rowse to the rescue of the hetero Bard', he says, 'You must remember William Shakespeare was 100% hetero, dear, while any number of people insisted that he was homo. Well, I wouldn't care tuppence if he was - Marlowe was 100% homo, only interested in the boys, but William Shakespeare was a strongly sexed hetero!' (24 February 1991.) including those based upon a recognition and subsequent oppression of so-called deviant sexualities.

The instancing of homoerotic writings from the Renaissance is not the only way of countering Bray's reluctance to acknowledge a discourse of homosexuality in the early modern period. Perhaps the best way of illustrating the seriousness with which the matter was considered is to turn our attention to the numerous contemporary condemnations of 'aberrant' sexualities. These are voiced in any number of prose denunciations of lewdness and immorality often linked with attacks on the theatre and my intention in considering them here is that they will lead conveniently into a discussion of the boy actor.

III

Thomas Beard's The Theatre of Gods Judgements contains a typical example of the horror of homosexuality which is commonplace in Renaissance conduct books. In Chapter XXXII of Book II, entitled 'Of effeminate persons, Sodomites, and other such like monsters', Beard cites a series of examples of homosexuals and transvestites that have received their come-uppance:

Sardanapalus King of Assyria, was so lasciuious and effeminate, that to the end to set forth his beauty, hee shamed not to paint his face with ointments, and to attire his body with the habites and ornaments of women, and on that manner to fit and lie continually amongst whores, & with them to commit all manner of filthinesse and villany: wherefore being thought vnworthy to beare rule ouer men, first Arbaces his lieutenant rebelled, then the Medes and Babylonians revolted, and iontly made warre vpon him, till they vanquished and put him to flight: and in his flight he returned to a tower in his pallace, which (mooued with griefe and despaire) he set on fire, and was consumed therein. 46

The moral is clear: sexual indulgence, transvestism and untempered gratification render the ruler unsuitable and deserving of death. There is something strangely Marlovian about this particular exemplar. Sardanapalus is a cross between the narcissistic Edward and the grandiose and exotic Tamburlaine. The climax of the story, set in the flaming tower, has a Marlovian intensity about it also. The lesson of the importance of moral probity in the ruler was a Renaissance commonplace. When Malcolm 'tests' Macduff with his boast that 'there's no bottom, none, / In my voluptuousness' (Macbeth, IV. iii. 60 - 61), Macduff replies that Malcolm is not only not fit to govern, but not fit to live (l. 103). Rulers thus serve as particularly effective examples of providential punishment for sexual misdemeanours:

two vnworthy Emperors, Commodus and Heliogabalus, who laying aside all Emperiall grauitie, shewed themselues oftentimes publiquely in womans attire; an act as in nature monstrous, so very dishonest and ignominious ... these cursed monsters ranne too much out of frame in their vnbridled lusts and affections. 47

As we might expect their end is nothing if not sensational, the former being poisoned and strangled 'when that would take no effect', and 'the other ... slaine in a iakes where he hid himselfe, and his body (drawne like carrion through the streets) found no better sepulchre but the dunghill.' 48 In these examples, the Elizabethan reader is insulated from the horror by the removal in time and space - these are ancient and oriental rulers. But Beard

46 Thomas Beard, The Theatre of Gods judgements (London, 1597), p. 359. Sardanapalus was obviously a proverbial example of lewdness. Thomas Heywood's Apology for Actors (London, 1612) remarks that 'Sardanapalus [is played as a moral lesson] against luxury.' (F 3'.) For more on Heywood, see below.

48 The Theatre, p. 360.
is eager to point out the modern relevance of these tales; for him nothing much has changed since God took the law into his own hands and destroyed those two Biblical dens of iniquity; even after the destruction of 'those abominable wretches of Sodome and Gomorrah ... there are [still] too many such monsters in the world, so mightily is it corrupted and depraued.' Occasionally this depravity was attributed to the general turpitude of Catholicism:

Pope Julius the third, whose custome was to promote none to Ecclesiasticall liuings, save onely his buggerers: amongst whome was one Innocent, whome this holy father ... would needs make Cardinall: nay, the vsatiable and monstrous lust of this beastly and stinking goat was so extraordinary that he could not abstaine from many Cardinals themselues.

The 'stinking goat' leads Beard quite naturally to an instance of bestiality. It is worth reminding ourselves that anal intercourse and bestiality were both legally termed sodomy and that there seems to have been little to choose between them - as Sir Voluptuous Beast has already told his wife!

It is not for nothing that the law of God forbiddeth to lie with a beast, and denounceth death against them that commit this foule sinne: for there haue been such monsters in the world at sometimes.... Crathes a sheepheard, that accompanied carnally with a shee goat, but the Buck finding him sleeping, offended and prouoked with this strange action, ran at him so furiously with his homes, that hee left him dead vpon the ground. God ... emploid ... this bucke about his seruice in executing iust vengeance vpon a wicked varlet.

---

49 Ibid., p. 361, misnumbered p.359.
50 Both Bray and Hill note that the sensationalism surrounding the trial and execution of the Earl of Castlehaven for rape and sodomy in 1631 was in part a result of his Catholicism. Homosexuality in Renaissance England, p. 49; 'Male Homosexuality', p. 227.
51 The Theatre, p. 361, misnumbered p. 359.
52 Ibid., p. 362.
The importance of this extraordinary tale to our discussion of homosexuality is to illustrate that the Renaissance grouped together all kinds of 'errant' sexualities from transvestism to caprine or ovine indiscretions, homoeroticism to incest. All were seen to represent a departure from the sacramental ideal of heterosexual monogamy and thus all were culpable. Fundamentally the sodomite was constructed discursively outside the structure of married monogamy as an example of the Renaissance nightmare of the inversion of the order of things. Such behaviour was literally anti-social and was thus the object of legislative power. Michel Foucault explains:

> What was taken into account in the civil and religious jurisdictions alike was a general unlawfulness. Doubtless acts 'contrary to nature' were stamped as especially abominable, but they were perceived simply as an extreme form of acts 'against the law'; they were infringements of decrees which were just as sacred as those of marriage, and which had been established for governing the order of things and the plan of beings.

Dressing in women's clothing, whoring, bestiality, homosexual intercourse and pederasty were an affront to an age which valued the conceptions of divine order and natural harmony. Bray writes forcefully:

> Homosexuality ... was not part of the chain of being, or the harmony of the created world or its universal dance. It was not part of the Kingdom of Heaven or its counterpart in the Kingdom of Hell.... What sodomy and buggery represented ... was ... the disorder in sexual relations that, in principle at least, could break out anywhere.

It is in the context of the conception of homosexuality as this terrible inversion of God's proper scheme of things that we should pick up the recurrent term monster. The title of 54 Homosexuality in Renaissance England, p. 25.

---

Beard's chapter was 'Of effeminate persons, Sodomites and other such like monsters'. Commodus and Heliogabalus's transvestism was 'an act ... monstrous', while the habitants of Sodom and Gomorrah were 'monsters'. The prelates were possessed of a 'monstrous lust' and those with a predilection for bestial intercourse are also labelled monsters. The term, like sodomy covers a multitude of sins and William Rankins employs it in his condemnation of sexual intemperance and theatrical indulgence when he published in 1587 his Mirrovr of Monsters: Wherein is plainely described the manifold vices, & sported enormities, that are caused by the infectious sight of Playes, with the description of the subtile slights of Sathan, making them his instruments. The tract clearly holds actors responsible for corruption in the state. Near the beginning Rankins describes them in the following vituperative terms:

> What men are these? (naie rather monsters) that thus corrupt so sweete a soile: such are they, as in outward shew seeme painted sepulchers, but digge vp their deeds, and finde nothing but a masse of rotten bones.

> Some terme them Comedians, othersome Players, manie Pleasers, but I Monsters, and why Monsters? Bicause vnder colour of humanitie they present nothing but prodigious vanitie.

As if we could have missed the point, a marginal note harangues us, They are monsters. For William Prynne, transvestites, such as the infamous

> Male-priests of Venus, the Roman Galli or Cinade, the passive Sodomites in Florida, Gayra and Peru; who clothing themselves sometimes, not alwayes in womans apparell ... are for this, recorded to posterity, as the very monsters of nature, and the shame, the scum of men. If men in womens apparel be thus execrable unto Pagans, how much more detestable should they bee to Christians who are taught not only by the light of nature, but of the Gospel too, to hate such beastly male-monsters in the shapes of women? 56

---

Phillip Stubbes condemns all transvestism whether or not it is part of a dramatic entertainment, citing as his authority Deuteronomy 22. 5: 'The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment: for all that do so, are abomination unto the Lord thy God.' Stubbes continues with the standard exegesis:

Our Appareil was given us as a sign distinctive to discern between sex and sex, and therefore one to wear the Apparel of another sex, is to participate with the same, and to adulterate the verity of his own kinde. Wherefore these [transvestites] may not improperly be called Hermaphroditic, that is, Monsters of both kinds, half women, half men. 57

The notion of clothes as a 'sign' of sex appears in Stephen Gosson's Playes Confuted in five Actions published the preceding year. Gosson again bases his condemnation of transvestism on divine commandments:

The Law of God very straitly forbids men to put on women's garments, garments are set downe for signs distinctiue between sexe & sexe, to take vs those garments that are manifest signs of another sexe, is to falsifie, forge, and adulterate, contrarie to the expresse rule of the worde of God. Which forbiddeth it by threatening a curse vs the same... in Stage Playes for a boy to put on the attyre, the gesture, the passions of a woman... is by outwarde signes to shewe them selues otherwise then they are. 58

---

56 Histrio-mastix, p. 200.
58 Stephen Gosson, Playes Confuted in five Actions, E 3v - E 5r.
It would seem that once again, as with Mercutio's distortion of linguistic signs which we have witnessed above (see chapter VI), that the law of the father is being undermined by 'refusing the signs', this time sartorial ones.

The anxieties over cross-dressing illustrate the Renaissance apprehension about dress which is inappropriate to the wearer either in terms of class or sex. 59 John Williams in a sermon before the King on 22 February 1619, attributed monstrous transvestites directly to the work of Satan, God 'had diuided male and female, but the deuill hath ioynd them, that mulier formosa, is now become mulier monstrosa superne, halfe man halfe woman'. 60 William Harrison's The Description of England (1587) notes that so much cross-dressing is taking place in respect of both sexes that 'women become men and men [are] transformed into monsters.' 61 John Rainoldes is clear about stage homoeroticism resultant from boy actors: 'Those monsters of nature, which burning in their lust one toward an other, men with men worke filthines, are as infamous, as Sodome: not the doers onelie, but the sufferers also.' 62 The furious insistence of these texts on the monstrous is symptomatic both of an obviously vehement contempt for the whole theatre-business but also, much more disturbingly, a fear of the illusionistic properties of the drama itself.

At stake in the various contentions over theatre and especially boy actors was a complex and critical question to do with the mimetic particularities of drama: that is, did the players actually become the characters they were playing on stage? Rankins is in no doubt that they did:

62 Th'Overthrow, p. 44.

Of which sort of men in the chief place, may be placed Players, when they take upon them the persons of heathen men, imagining themselves (to vaine glory in the wrath of God) to be the men whose persons they present ... No doubt but there is amongst them can play Judas, as naturally as if he were the very man that betrayed Christ, & verily think that the visarde of godly learning, is so far from good liuing, that under these pretended collours, these godlesse men crucifie Christ a newe. 63

For Prynne, the transmutation undermined all aspects of masculinity: 'our men-woman Actors are most effeminate, both in apparell, body, words and workes.' 64 The possible metamorphosis of the player was all the more dangerous in the case of boy actors performing female roles because, according to some of the commentators, boys and women were naturally alike. Rosalind notes this affinity when she tells Orlando how she has acted as a mock-fiancé(e) in the past; of one of her former clients she tells him:

He was to imagine me his love, his mistress; and I set him every day to woo me; at which time would I, being but a moonish youth, grieve, be effeminate, changeable, longing and liking, proud, fantastical, apish, shallow, inconstant, full of tears, full of smiles; for every passion something, and for no passion truly anything, as boys and women are for the most part cattle of this colour.

(III. ii. 373, my emphases)

The capricious youth has a lot in common with woman, who according to the misogynist mythologies of the period, was characterised by inconstancy and instability: 'Frailty, thy name is woman.' As far as the opponents of the theatre were concerned, this affinity made the youths particularly vulnerable to a kind of transsexual identity crisis. In fact it is important to recognise that the similarity between women and boys and their mutual disparity from men had always underpinned a discourse of homosexual desire. Thomas Stehling, writing of homoerotic poetry of the twelfth century, notices that 'it makes male beauty a category of female beauty. Nobody here is tall, dark and handsome; instead we find only fair and pretty boys.' 65

63  Mirrour, G 3.
64  Histrio-mastix, p. 187.

The correspondence between boys and women was not merely the result of theatrical activity. Stephen Orgel notes that up to the age of about seven years, male children were treated exactly the same as females and that they acquired their manhood when they were 'breeched' - put into breeches - 'a formal move into the world of men [and] traditionally the occasion for a significant family ceremony'. 66 Manhood then is a condition into which boys grow and from which women are always excluded. Boys and women begin in a comparable state and it is this similarity which threatens to facilitate the monstrous transmutation of the boy actor into the woman that he plays. Indeed this is exactly the situation of Ganymede who is transformed into the woman that she plays for Orlando's benefit. As Sandra Clark writes, 'The love of women was not infrequently coupled with the love of boys in Renaissance literature'. 67

According to the anti-theatrical propagandists then, acting is not a form of disciplined pretence but a kind of dramatic transubstantiation; to act immorally on stage is to be immoral in real-life. It is not disbelief but identity itself which is suspended, or rather unfixed as the player is required to abnegate his own self and exchange his person for a persona. Laura Levine writes, 'It is not that the actor himself has the power to shape

65 Stehling, 'To love a Medieval Boy', p. 156.
67 Clark, 'Hic Mulier, Haec Vir', p. 159.
identity, but that the part is actually constitutive and shapes the man [or, we should add, boy] who plays it.' The iniquity of playing is thus not a function of any collaborative imaginative self-delusion by company and audience, it is the factual metamorphosis of the actor into the character and this transformation is an insult to the God that shaped the actor's body in the first place. It is no accident that the transfiguration of Bottom into an ass takes place within the context of a dramatic rehearsal. The mutation is symptomatic of the theatre's ultimate possibilities and dangers in a play which alludes parodically to one of the period's most widely known classical texts which treats the subject of physical transformation and shape-shifting, Ovid's Metamorphoses. Prynne is possibly alluding to this very source when he remarks upon the degradation of playing:

I may ... condemne these Play-house Vizards, vestments, images and disguises, which during their usage in outward appearance offer a kinde of violence to Gods owne Image and mens humane shapes, metamorphosing them into those idolatrous, those brutish formes, in which God never made them.

The very physicality of the performer is at stake. Rankins remarks:

men doo then transforme that glorious image of Christ, into the brutish shape of a rude beast, when the temple of our bodies which should be consecrate vnto him, is made a stage of stinking stuffe, a den for theeues, and a habitation for insatiate monsters.

The actor's body is a 'stage of stinking stuffe', a place of corporeal corruption and mortal degradation - a site, in short, fit only 'for insatiate monsters'. Shakespeare seems cognisant of the word as signifying particularly bodily uncertainty. As Stephano

---

69 Histrio-mastix, p. 893, my emphasis.

70 Mirror, B ii", my emphases.
struggles to make sense of the bizarre corporeality of Caliban and Trinculo beneath a gabardine, he ponders, 'Four legs and two voices; a most delicate monster!' (II. ii. 83). But it is in Shakespeare's employment of the term to refer to the sexual confusion of his transvestite characters that Rankins's concerns are most obviously highlighted. As Viola, disguised as Cesario, realises that Olivia has fallen for her, she laments her deceptive physicality which has not only cheated the Countess but has prevented her own confession of love to Orsino:

My master loves her dearly,
And I, poor monster, fond as much on him;
And she, mistaken, seems to dote on me.
What will become of this? As I am man,
My state is desperate for my master's love;
As I am woman - now alas the day! -
What thriftless sighs shall poor Olivia breathe!

(II. ii. 31 - 37, my emphasis)

Viola is both man and woman here, frustrate in both guises, transfixed in her own transvestism - a boy actor, playing a girl, performing a boy. Her brother's later admission is a double-take at this 'monstrous' duality as he explains to Olivia that 'You are betroth'd both to a maid and man' (V. i. 255) - to the play's own 'master-mistress'.

Jonathan Dollimore wryly notes that the cross in 'cross-dressing' can be thought of as both 'to mix (as in to cross-breed) and to contradict (as in to cross someone). 71 We might also add, that in its capacity to arouse attacks as vituperative as those cited above, the device also causes a good deal of cross commentary and that this hostility is targeted not merely at the transvestism that occurs when Viola, Innogen, Portia or Rosalind dress up as Cesario, Fidele, Balthasar or Ganymede, but every time an actor becomes another person, especially when that other person is of the opposite sex.

IV

It is with a sense of the vehemence of the opposition to cross-dressing in the period that we should approach Stephen Greenblatt's enormously influential paper on the subject of Renaissance (homo)sexuality, Fiction and Friction. Based on the writings of Renaissance medicine and gynaecology, and on several bizarre accounts of sexual transmutation, Greenblatt attempts to demonstrate that femaleness was perceived as simply a partially formed maleness and that sexual homology constructed woman as a genitaly interiorised man.

At least since the time of Galen it had been widely thought that both males and females contained both male and female elements.... since Galen it had been believed that the male and female sexual organs were altogether comparable, indeed mirror images of each other.... In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, physicians and laymen of sharply divergent schools agreed that male and female sexual organs were fully homologous.

The implications of this fascinating thesis are enormous for the present discussion for if women were basically semi-realised men, then all difference between homo- and heteroeroticism disappears. As Greenblatt mischievously puts it, 'One consequence of this conceptual scheme - "For that which man hath apparent without, that women have hid within" - is an apparent homoeroticism in all sexuality.' The obvious response to this argument is that if men and women were seen to be essentially the same, then why do the anti-theatrical polemicists of the period become so anxious about cross-dressing? If men and women are thought to be identically endowed, though configured differently, the objections of Rankins, Prynne and the like would make no sense.

---

I would like to complicate the issue further by engaging with Greenblatt on two other counts. Firstly the rather blithe assertion that the theory of genital homology was sponsored by 'physicians and laymen of sharply divergent schools' is at odds with the facts as presented by Ian McLean in his The Renaissance Version of Woman who actually charts the breakdown of the scientific certitude in genital homology, instancing the 'Parisian Doctor André Du Laurens [who] writes a very coherent account of [the] medical dispute in 1593, concluding against comparability.' 75 MacLean goes on to assert that

By 1600, in nearly all medical circles ... one sex is no longer thought to be an incomplete version of the other. Indeed, far from being described as an inferior organ, the uterus now evokes admiration and eulogy for its remarkable rôle in procreation. 76

Key sections of Greenblatt's evidence are drawn from editions of Galen, Ambroise Paré, and Henri Estienne which were published in 1536, 1573, and 1579 respectively. Yet the conclusions he draws from them are cited in an attempt to explain the sexual situation of Shakespeare's heroines, who were created well over half a century after the publication of the first of these sources. The challenges to the homological theory were in fact occurring at precisely the time of the composition of Shakespeare's plays. For example, Thomas Vicary in his The Anatomie of the Body of Man published in 1586, likens the clitoris to the penis when he refers to it as tentigo (a term he borrows from Albucasis an Arab writer of the eleventh century), meaning 'tenseness or lust, an erection'. But by 1615, Helkiah Crooke is pointing out the differences between clitoris and penis when he notes that the former 'is a small body, not continued at all with the bladder, but placed in the height of the lap. The clitoris hath no passage for the emission of seed; but the virile member is long and hath a passage for seed.' Greenblatt is not only temporally but geographically adrift in his selection of evidence for as Stephen Orgel points out, 'the medical theorists [that Greenblatt draws upon] are for the most part French and Italian, and France and Italy did not develop transvestite theatres.' Greenblatt's central thesis, then, is undermined both by the abundant and fierce treatises of the anti-theatre lobby which certainly indicate that the theory of genital homology was not universally accepted, and by his anachronistic and inapposite selection of primary sources.

76 Ibid., p. 33.

Secondly, and perhaps less centrally, we ought to note that 'Fiction and Friction' is of a piece with the new historicist propensity to analyse forms of sociality only within a framework which serves to promulgate the very power structures under scrutiny and that as a direct consequence of its argument, oppositional voices and subversive strategies surrounding issues of sexuality are utterly disempowered. This tendency has been reproved by materialist critics and is perhaps the clearest division between American new historicism and English cultural materialism. In her editorial introduction to The Matter of Difference, for example, Valerie Wayne castigates what she calls 'the depoliticising

---

78 Orgel, 'Nobody's Perfect', p. 17. Prynne laments the whorish practice of using females on stage - 'they have now their female-Players in Italy, and other forraigne parts, and as they had such French-women Actors, in a Play not long since personated in Black-friers Play-house, to which there was a great resort.' (Histrio-mastix, pp. 214 - 215.)

80 For the subversion of patriarchy through linguistic ambiguity for example, see chapter VI.
tendencies of some new historical practice' and 'its apolitical and recuperative effects'. In the case of 'Fiction and Friction', one might be tempted to ask, if all men and women are really men, then what hope for feminism?

Although Greenblatt does overlook the severity of the anti-theatrical polemicists in his effort to support his thesis that in essence, there was no transformation going on when boys dressed as girls, and though his argument is flawed in the ways described above, it is not the case either that the invective attitude towards dramatic transvestism was universally shared. While Gosson, Rankins, Prynne and others worried about the transformation of boys into monstrous parodies of women, the professional thespians seemed interested in demonstrating the error of their opponents' ways. Of these, the most notable is Thomas Heywood whose An Apology for Actors was published in 1612. Obviously, the pamphlet's success was important to the industry and various poets and playwrights indicated their support for it by prefixing the essay with eulogistic poems. John Webster, for example, notes that far from theatre being a place of vice and iniquity, it is an instrument for moral direction, displaying the evils of past men for the instruction of those of the present, 'Who dead would not be acted by their will / It seems such men have acted their lives ill.' As Hamlet tells Polonius, the players 'are the abstract and brief chronicles of the time; after your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you live' (II. ii. 520). In another introductory poem, 'To my approued good friend M THOMAS HEYWOOD', John Taylor ingeniously proposes that if the play's moral import is being overlooked by its puritan opponents, then the fault lies not in the drama, but in them:

---

A Play's a true transparant Christall mirror,
To shew good minds their mirth, the bad their terror...
For Playes are good or bad as they are vs'd,
And best inuentions often are abus'd. 83

With this sentiment, Heywood himself concurs, 'Playes are in vse as they are vnderstood, / Spectators eyes may make them bad or good.' 84 In line with this stress on the hermeneutic duty of the spectator, Heywood emphasises the allegorical import of the Scriptures when he tackles the tricky subject of transvestism:

Yea (but say some) you ought not to confound the habits of either sex, as to let your boyes weare the attires of virgins, &c. To which I answer: The Scriptures are not alwayes to be expounded meereely, according to the letter ... but they ought exactly to be conferred with the purpose they handle. To do as Sodomites did, vse preposterous lusts in preposterous habits, is in that text flatly and severely forbidden: nor can I imagine any man that hath in him any taste or relish of Christianity, to be guilty of so abhorred a sinne. Besides, it is not probable, that Playes were meant in that text, because we read not of any Playes knowne in that time that Deuteronomie was writ, among the Children of Israel. 85

For Heywood, there is never any danger of the parable of transvestite drama turning into truth: 'To see our youths attired in the habit of women, who knowes not what their intents be? who cannot distinguish them by their names, assuredly knowing they are but to represent such a Lady, at such a tyme appoynted?' 86 Of course, such a prolific playwright as Heywood, a man reliant on theatre for his livelihood, is unlikely to bite the hand that feeds him. Even so, a reading of the drama of the period, with its plethora of jokes and double-takes dependent upon cross-dressing, suggests that the audience were 82 An Apology for Actors, (London, 1612), A 6r.

83 Ibid., A 7v.
84 Ibid., F 2r.
85 Ibid., C 3r.
86 Ibid., C 3v.
unlikely to have been seduced by theatrical convention and to have mistaken the boy actors for the women that they played. William Gager, like Heywood, clearly differentiates between sodomitic acts and theatrical representation:

> it doth not beseeme them to folow wemens maners: in the common course of life, to the perverting of the law of nature, honestie, and comelines; or for any evill purpose; yet a boy, by way of representation onely, may, not indecently, imitate maydenlie or womanlie demeanour. 87

For the most part, accounts of audience experience are well able to separate life and art. When, for example, Thomas Coryate saw women on the stage in Venice in 1608 he was impressed: they 'performed ... with as good a grace, action, gesture and whatsoever convenient for a Player, as ever I saw any masculine Actor'. 88 The fact that these female actors were considered to have performed women's roles as well as the boys back home, implies that Coryate for one was under no illusion when attending the English theatre. Boy actors must have been accepted as a convention, otherwise the effect of so many of the stage jokes would have been lost. When Christopher Sly 'recognises' his long-lost wife (who is of course a page) and suggests that they make up for fifteen years sexual inactivity, the page has hastily to grope for an excuse:

\[
\begin{align*}
Sly: & \quad \text{Madam, undress you and come now to bed.} \\
Page: & \quad \text{Thrice noble lord, let me entreat of you} \\
& \quad \text{To pardon me yet for a night or two,} \\ & \quad \text{Or, if not so, until the sun be set.} \\
& \quad \text{For your physicians have expressly charg'd,} \\
& \quad \text{In peril to incur your former malady,} \\
& \quad \text{That I should yet absent me from your bed.} \\ & \quad \text{(Induction. II. 120)}
\end{align*} \]

There is surely a double-take here as the page in woman's clothing is seen to be a confidence trick in which the audience share at the expense of the gullible drunk. The paradox of course, is that a Renaissance audience was prepared daily to accept plays in which this cross-dressed pretence occurred as a matter of course. The effect of this scene is to foreground the conventions of Elizabethan theatre and to alert the audience to the ludicrous nature of misapprehending theatre as life. Sly mistakes the boy for a girl for the same reason that he mistakes himself for a lord: he is a fool. Hamlet offers another transparent example of the self-consciousness of the playwright in using boy actors. As he greets the players, the Prince notes that the boy who played the female roles has grown in height and is sporting the first signs of a beard, 'O, my old friend! Thy face is valanc'd since I saw thee last; com'st thou to beard me in Denmark? - What, my young lady and mistress!' (II. ii. 418). He continues lightly, 'Pray God, your voice, like a piece of uncurren[t] gold be not crack'd within the ring' (I. 420). These stagey jokes staged can only have been designed to be apprehended; they are not secret signatures for the reading cognoscenti since in Shakespeare's day there were none. Not all contemporary critics agree however that Shakespeare wanted deliberately to expose the boy beneath the skin. Robert Kimbrough for example, protests that 'a speech assigned by Shakespeare to a woman in disguise as a boy can work in the theatre only if the audience knows and accepts that the speaker is really a woman.... We do Shakespeare a disservice not to accept his women as women.' 89 Kimbrough's mistake is that he considers the Renaissance theatre to be illusionist in the first place. In writing of Rosalind, he betrays an attitude to drama which is simply anachronistic:

---

In consciously using her disguise to act in a way that society will not allow a woman to act, she is more her real, essential self - or can move more easily to discovery and revelation of that essential self.

The point is, that there is no 'essential self', only performances of it, as rendered by each actor (male or female) who takes the role. A theatre without the modern technical sophistication - set, lights, sound, etc. - is of necessity a theatre of self-consciousness.

In the light of Shakespeare's deliberate - even heavy-handed - gender jokes, Kimbrough's essentialist protestations should not be accepted uncritically.

Perhaps the most obvious example of Shakespeare's self-consciousness when using boy actors comes late in Antony and Cleopatra. As the Egyptian Queen laments the theatricalisation of her reign, she anticipates the humiliation of being portrayed by a male youth:

> the quick comedians
> Extemporally will stage us, and present
> Our Alexandrian revels; Antony
> Shall be brought drunken forth, and I shall see
> Some squeaking Cleopatra boy my greatness
> I'th' posture of a whore.

(V. ii. 214 - 219)

Phyllis Rackin points out that 'The speech was troublesome to Shakespeare's nineteenth-century editors who were reluctant to read boy as a verb.' The OED however defines the verb as 'To represent (a woman's part) on the stage, as boys did before the Restoration', and illustrates with instances from 1568 and 1573 as well as this particular example. This is Shakespeare at his most self-consciously representational, reminding his audience in the very teeth of Cleopatra's fear that she will be parodied by a boy, that she is being parodied by a boy. As I remarked above in chapter IV, nowhere do we see the goddess on her barge; nowhere is there a pretence at 'reality'. It is as though Shakespeare's boy actor needs to remind us that the play we are watching is an illusion, that 'Before [Shakespeare] can evoke Cleopatra's greatness, he must remind us that he cannot truly represent it.' The Renaissance audience were never required to forego a knowledge that they could not help but possess - that they were at a play and that these actors were precisely that whether they impersonated kings, villains or women. For all the disapproval of the polemicists, there was no more chance of confusing Kenneth Branagh with Hamlet or mistaking Judi Dench for Volumnia. As Phyllis Rackin puts it:

---

Shakespeare refuses to dissolve the difference between the sex of the boy actor and that of the heroine he plays; and he uses his boy heroines' sexual ambiguity not only to complicate his plots but also to resolve them. Portia's masculine disguise enables her to save Antonio, but her female reality, which enables her to love and marry Bassanio, is what motivates her to do it in the first place. By playing the boy's part of Ganymede, Rosalind enables Silvius to marry Phebe. By playing the girl's part of Rosalind, she enables Orlando to marry herself. These heroines' transvestite disguises are neither fully repudiated ... nor fully authenticated.

Shakespeare's otherwise deeply misogynist canon can be neatly appropriated for feminism by pointing out that the playwright is in fact repeatedly deconstructing the essentialism of binary opposites based on the category of male/female. Marianne L. Novy's rather sentimental Love's Argument is typical of this approach:

---

remembering the boy-actor convention adds another dimension of awareness of gender as construction ... If boys can play women and the characters that we think of as women can play boys, this reminds us doubly that gender can be seen as a role rather than as [a] biological given. Shakespeare's use of cross-gender images, visual and verbal, cannot come simply from the requirements of stage conditions. Rather, I believe it results from Shakespeare's ability to see through the limitations of conventional gender expectations. 95

This is also the view of Juliet Stevenson, the actress who played Rosalind in the 1985 RSC production of As You Like It: 'I'd always suspected that there's a much more dangerous play in As You Like It. A subversive play, one that challenges notions of gender, that asks questions about the boundaries and qualities of our 'male' and 'female' natures.' 96 Paradoxically though, the playing of women's parts by women on the modern stage may have actually served to shut down this aspect of the plays' feminism. The self-conscious ironies of the various transvestite boy-heroines further pretending to be boys or of having Sly's wife played by a boy who is a page pretending to be a woman, must inevitably be invalidated when the parts of female characters are taken by female actors. The effect is to thin the complexity of the transsexual motif - for boy posing as girl posing as boy we now have to read simply, girl posing as boy. When Dollimore writes that the question surrounding the boy players - 'which, or how many, of the several gender identities embodied in any one figure are in play at any one time?' - is 'a question which remains intriguing for us today' he is precisely wrong. 97 The straightforward answer to his question is two instead of three. Ironically the arrival of female actors in the theatre has eroded the polysemy of the dramatic representation and served to weaken the apparent radicalism with which, according to critics like Novy, Shakespeare was challenging sexual stereotyping.

I believe that the humanist desire to find in Shakespeare a proto-feminism is misplaced when it is reliant upon what Kathleen McLuskie has called 'psychological realist modes of interpretation.' Considering the prevailing ideologies of the period and the 'woman question' it is little wonder that feminist critics of the Renaissance are abandoning 'that most patriarchal body of texts, the works of William Shakespeare' and attempting to recoup hitherto uncharted material by women writers of the period. Rather than functioning to highlight issues of feminism, I would contend that Shakespeare's boy actor serves as a basis for the interrogation of issues surrounding male homoeroticism. This is because, quite simply, in a large number of the plays, especially the comedies, the wooing takes place between two men both diegetically (Ganymede and Orlando) and extradiegetically (the boy playing Rosalind and the boy playing Orlando). There is then an exact equivalence between the two kinds of playing in my title; erotic engagement at the level of the story is paralleled by same-sex performance at the level of the storytelling and it is in this context that the otherwise extreme claim of the theatrical opponents - that the audience are vulnerable to an erosion of their heterosexuality - needs to be read.

In Still Harping on Daughters, Lisa Jardine was one of the first commentators to investigate the question of Shakespeare's boy actors specifically in relation to the modes of eroticism that they aroused. She contends that the erotic interest of the audience towards the boy actor 'hovers somewhere between the heterosexual and the

---

97 Sexual Dissidence, p. 293.

98 Kathleen McLuskie, 'The Act, the Role, and the Actor: Boy Actresses on the Elizabethan Stage', New Theatre Quarterly, 3 (1987), 120 - 130, p. 128. She concludes her essay by stressing the importance of recognising the place of the boy actor for a feminist criticism: 'the reminder of the original boy actresses might alert the reader to the complex theatrical construction and the historical specificity of the Elizabethan drama, which might provide a salutary disruption of the authority of their images of womanhood' (p. 130).

100 As evidence of this tendency, at the conference Voicing Women: Gender/Sexuality/Writing 1500 - 1700 (University of Liverpool, April 1992), of the 37 papers, three were about Shakespeare - all of which, embarrassingly, were presented by men.
Jardine is right, but for the wrong reasons. She is correct to assume that the boy actor was, as I have shown, a focus of homoerotic interest but she is wrong in as much as she adduces her argument almost exclusively from the views of the Puritan opponents who can hardly have been expected to write about the theatre in an objective or reasonable way. When they imply that the theatre is a den of iniquity, we should not always assume, as Jardine does, that they were telling the truth - propagandists rarely do. There is however, ample evidence from the plays themselves to demonstrate the overlap between boy actors and erotic motivation. This is primarily the result of the equivalence between the same-sex eroticism in the story - Ganymede/Orlando, Cesario/Orsino etc and the all-maleness of the company performing the story. As Jardine puts it, 'whenever Shakespeare's female characters ... draw attention to their own androgyny ... the resulting eroticism is to be associated with their maleness rather than with their femaleness.'

Despite Jardine's telling analysis, she shows herself to be hostile to the boy actor himself. At one point, she refers to him as 'Ganymede deriding the ways of woman, ... the boy-actor mincing and lisping his way through his "woman's part".' It is unfortunate that in her desire to address what she takes to be the sexism of an exclusively male acting company, Jardine begins to sound homophobic. In this she is not alone and this homophobia is itself symptomatic of the difficulty of separating out performance and erotic arousal, playing and playing. James L. Hill offers another example of this.

---

101 Still Harping, p. 11.
102 In this respect I disagree with Colin MacCabe who writes, 'I would argue that the Puritan attacks on the theatre are perhaps the best introduction to understanding what Elizabethan theatre was actually like.' (Colin MacCabe, 'Abusing the self and others: puritan accounts of the Shakespearian stage', Critical Quarterly, 30 (1988), 3 - 17, p. 4.) Only Gosson seems to have had any first-hand experience of the theatre (see MacCabe, p. 6).
103 Still Harping, p. 20.
104 Ibid., p. 20.
antipathy towards Shakespeare's boy actors. His article, "What are they Children?" Shakespeare's Tragic Women and the Boy Actors', argues that the boys were not very accomplished and that they certainly were not to be trusted with major roles. The article is a bizarre attempt to belittle the female roles in the plays in an effort to demonstrate that Shakespeare himself was aware of the shortcomings of his young actors and so deliberately reduced the dramatic demands he made upon them. For example, Hill writes, 'Gertrude's speeches are quite short, and much of her response would be in pantomime, as would be Ophelia's in her confrontation scene.' The essay is predicated throughout upon a prejudice against the boy actors. For Hill, they are just not manly enough: 'The demands upon the actor playing Lear are so infinitely beyond those made upon the boy playing Ophelia that there is little point in comparing them.' The implication - that Shakespeare's women are easier to play than his men - is entirely unsound; one could easily counterargue by noting that Beatrice or Paulina are more demanding roles than Osric or Fabian. When Hill notes that 'Lady Macbeth's characterization is one-dimensional and non-developing', he simply demonstrates that he has never been in a rehearsal room! Underpinning Hill's whole essay is the assumption that the boy actor is an impaired performer, not up to playing a masculine role, liable to be 'overwhelmed by its dramatic demands.' For Hill, Shakespeare's boys were less than men. The article, though entirely erroneous, is interesting in the sense that it demonstrates once again the tendency to blend the role and the actor. If Goneril has fewer lines than Lear (which is of course true), then it must be, proposes Hill, because the person playing Goneril is not as strong as the actor playing Lear. Once again,

106 Ibid., p. 243.
107 Ibid., p. 242.
108 Ibid., p. 251.
questions of performance and potency in both dramatic and sexual senses are imminent in this assumption - even the role of Cleopatra, we are told, 'is comparatively easy compared to the range [of] Hamlet ... or Lear ... or of Antony'. Hill never attempts to refute the suggestion that boy actors formed the focus of homoerotic attention; instead, he simply criticises them as performers in a manner which, like Jardine’s, smacks of homophobia. Other critics find the very suggestion of homoeroticism surrounding the boy players to be simply too embarrassing. Kenneth Muir attempts to discount the possibility by drawing on his own experience:

Until comparatively recently, it was the custom in English boarding schools for female parts to be played by boys. Although there was a certain amount of mild homosexuality in the school I attended, I do not recall any example of a boy playing a woman’s part being the recipient of homosexual attentions, although the boys who played Mrs Fainall and Millamant in Congreve’s The Way of the World made pretty women, and Lady Macbeth a remarkably handsome one.

Despite his claim that the homosexuality at his own school was only of the ‘mild’ kind (whatever that is), Muir confesses a not unanxious attraction for the boys in girl’s clothes. In his attempt to discount the homoerotic appeal of boy actors, Muir ends up illustrating his own sexually-charged awareness of them!

Parts for women in classical drama are fewer than those for men and all-male companies must assume a responsibility for further disenfranchising women in the profession. The pressure and the overwhelming outcome is to perform Shakespeare's plays with male and female parts being played by actors of the 'right' sex. Productions as a Renaissance audience would have seen them, in this respect, are not common. In 1991 - 92 however, Declan Donnellan directed an all-male version of As You Like It for the theatre company of which he is artistic director, Cheek by Jowl. The testament to the success of the 'female' performances - Tom Hollander as Celia and Adrian Lester as Rosalind - was the rapid cessation, following their first entrance, of audience embarrassment (which itself is the evidence of how far theatrical expectations have shifted in the last four hundred years). The risks were high, Donnellan requiring these two actors to perform the court scenes in full length dresses, beads, lipstick, and earrings and with piping voices; moreover, both of them utilised a rather clumsy and glib girlie giggling which did little to intensify the emotional tension between the characters. In this early part of the play, the production ran the risk of losing the story under the novelty of transvestism. It may well be that the production flirted with this possibility, but the care with which Donnellan had prepared us for their cross dressing suggested that this was probably not the case. At the beginning of the show, the full company assembled on stage in a standard uniform of black trousers and collarless shirts. One of the actors stepped forwards and announced, 'All the world's a stage, / And all the men [whole company except two move across stage right] and women [Hollander and Lester move down-stage left] merely players.'

---

109 Ibid., p. 254.

The relationship of the 'women' was infused with comic lightness. In her attempts to console the isolated and dejected Rosalind, Celia would lift her friend's skirt and kiss her calves. There was a playfulness and a clear homoeroticism about the gesture which was sharpened by Celia's passionate defence of Senior's daughter in the face of her father's brutality: 'we still have slept together, / Rose at an instant...' (I. iii. 69 - 70). Jardine's contention that 'whenever Shakespeare's female characters ... draw attention to their own androgyny ... the resulting eroticism is to be associated with their maleness rather than with their femaleness was clearly demonstrated by this relationship. The actors, although playing women, were visibly male (their dresses were sheer and there was no bosom padding), and the intimation of a primary erotic relationship between them was consequently more heavily suggestive of male homosexuality than lesbianism. As Orlando wooed Ganymede, Hollander's Celia movingly looked on in a mixture of petulant jealousy and pathetic resignation. The frustration was pointed up in her reprimand, 'You have simply misused our sex in your love-prate' (IV. i. 181). Rosalind's response - 'O coz, coz, my pretty little coz ...' - was an attempt to calm her but also an acknowledgement that Orlando had come between them. Again, the precise nature of the attraction was an ambiguous intermixture of male homoeroticism and heterosexuality.

Lester's Ganymede was a combination of bravado and brittle emotional instability, one minute cooing, the next shouting, the next indulgently fantasising. At one point, as Joe Dixon's homosexual and ostentatiously thespian Jaques made to kiss the boy, Ganymede demonstrated her 'true' (ie, female) sex by taking his hand and placing it on her breast. Of course the fact that the actor was male doubled the irony with which Jaques met this peculiarly androgynous figure. All of the boy/girl/boy/girl gender-bending was dramatically imminent. By the time Sam Graham's Phoebe and Richard Cant's Audrey entered, there was a playful self-consciousness about the cross dressing. This allowed the foul Audrey to enter subsequently for the wedding in a tiny bright yellow mini-dress!

Donnellan, at the final moment, shocked the audience out of the comic comfort of Arden. As the couples lined up to be married, each bride knelt downstage of her partner. Rosalind entered to provide the solution to the marital riddle. She lifted her veil and told Orlando, 'To you I give myself, for I am yours.' Orlando, with a look of utter shock, staggered back and shoved her from him, darting upstage. Rejected, Rosalind had no option but to throw herself, weeping, on her father, 'To you I give myself, for I am yours.' In this reversal of addressees (in the text she speaks to her father first), Rosalind made the lines failed and successful attempts to submit herself to male authority figures. Orlando visually recanted and walked downstage to reclaim his wife; but the damage had been done and the effect was to question the firmness of such a union. The presence of Jaques, looking on in a mixture of cynicism and superciliousness, did little to set these misgivings to rest and, despite the cheerful dancing at the end, the sour flavour remained.

The force of this closing sequence was to imply that Orlando was unable to face as a woman the boy he had been wooing - he was clearly embarrassed that his male confident turned out to be his future wife and that the love that Ganymede had protested during their courtship was nothing less than a homosexual version of the erotic discourse in which he had been training. The extraordinary achievement of this production was that, in casting male actors, all of this ambiguity was obvious to the audience in a way that it could not have been to Orlando. Despite the final unveiling of Ganymede as Rosalind, the actual presence of the boy actor tended to reinforce the homoerotic element of the relationship and, although Orlando was seeing this for the first time, he was seeing it in reverse (plate N). For him the character he had met in the forest was transformed from man into a woman. For us she/he had never been anything else but a man.

While Donnellan's As You Like It raised issues of homoeroticism through its casting of male actors and its careful exploitation of them in dramatic situations such as the unveiling of Rosalind, Sam Mendes's Troilus and Cressida for the RSC's 1990 - 91 season emphasised the degraded nature of all sexual relationships whether homo- or heterosexual. Troilus and Cressida of course contains the most explicitly homosexual relationship in the canon, but it is also a play engaged (along with every other) with the relationships between men and women, and in particular with the issue of female fidelity. It is worth reminding ourselves that while Hermione, Desdemona, Innogen, and Hero are assumed to be unfaithful to their partners, only Cressida actually is. This idea of sexual betrayal set the tone for a production which despised human sexuality with all the vehemence of Thersites: 'Lechery, lechery! Still wars and lechery! Nothing else holds fashion. A burning devil take them!' (V. ii. 192) It was thus entirely fitting and symptomatic of the production as a whole that the face that launched a thousand ships, the woman at the centre of the most epic of all wars, the ultimate goddess of physical desire, was a tired and lewd vamp with something of Fenella Fielding's coarse sexuality in Carry On Screaming. Sally Dexter's Helen of Troy was brought downstage on the shoulders of four semi-naked servants, wrapped in gold material like a present. Paris unwrapped her and the irony was apparent. A curly black wig, a tight red dress with a heaving décolleté, and make-up that was so thickly and badly applied that it caused a mixture of revulsion and embarrassment (plate O). Pandarus's song degenerated into a series of absurd sexual grunts, accompanied by phallic thrusts, and Helen licked him and groaned in lascivious appreciation. Mendes, in this brilliantly directed central scene, completely emptied the epic tale of all its grandiose and awe-inspiring pretensions. Instead of the mythical Helen, he offered us the woman to which Diomedes attributes the destruction around him: 'For every false drop in her bawdy veins / A Grecian's life hath sunk; for every scruple / Of her contaminated carrion weight / A Trojan hath been slain' (IV. i. 71 - 74). Instead of beauties, Mendes showed us whores; instead of warriors, he showed us mortals tainted by an onanistic lethargy. The production's attitude to human relationships was infused throughout with a caustic nihilism.
Much of the sexual deviousness of the production was placed in Norman Rodway's pimpish Pandarus. Dressed in blazer and panama, Rodway was a swanky combination of humorous do-gooder and camp voyeur. His admiration for Troilus was close to fantasy and he relished his physical details, like his cloven chin, with such abandon that it was clear that Cressida was not the only one attracted to him. Throughout he was the source of much kissing and patting on bottoms, flirtation and double entendre. Pandarus was entirely nonchalant about sexual morality with a tired indifference towards the enormity of the consequences of marital infidelity: 'The ravish'd Helen, Menelaus' queen, / With wanton Paris sleeps [pause, shrug shoulders] - and that's the quarrel' (Prologue. 10).

There was a prevailing atmosphere of enervation and listlessness towards the possibility of forming human relationships, signalled most clearly in the ennui of Achilles.

Ci-an Hinds's was a disaffected new-romantic Achilles. In black leather boots and trousers, buckles and straps and with black string vest, slicked-back hair, and designer stubble, he looked like something out of early eighties pop - a member of the band Fashion which self-consciously challenged the thuggish masculinity of punk (plate P). Hinds sometimes assumed a black leather maxi coat which swept after him as he exited with a self-dramatising and androgynous flourish. When he welcomed Hector to the Greek lines, he draped himself from a ladder upstage and whispered a smouldering Willkommen in the manner of Emcee from Cabaret. The allusion to the musical, with its sordid and corrupt atmosphere was entirely appropriate in a world where 'Nothing [is] but lechery [and] All [are] incontinent varlets!' (V. i. 95).

Girard René has attributed the negligence towards Troilus and Cressida to 'the false exigencies of conventional morality [which, until a few years ago] dominated the Kenneth Muir is typical of the tendency to attack, in particular, the play's explicit homoerotic relationship. He writes that 'The Achilles-Patroclus relationship in Troilus and Cressida is apparently regarded with distaste.' It is, but mainly by belligerent generals whose desire is to inspire Achilles back into battle, and by the cynical and vicious Thersites. Mendes's production illustrated the utter indifference of the play towards a discrimination between different kinds of eroticism or the sex of the object desired. It is in this sense that Shakespeare demonstrates his fundamental ambiguity towards different kinds of sexuality and a complete refusal to simplify desire and the afflictions caused by it.

VI

He remembered Ophelia. All those nights stripping the dress from his body, the wrong body, he had been in such trouble, his hands, not his hands, the only words in his head, her chilly plaints, his hair not his hair, prickling ghoststruck under the mat of long blonde hair he lifted off, nightly. Her breaking song he heard from some lost part of himself crying to get out, to come back in, which? It was like being 'spread' only without the sense of thin air and extended space - out of himself, but only to be cabined and confined in strange clothes and clogging skin of greasepaint, rubber breasts and her shroud wound and knotted round his limbs. He had heard singing and screaming and had never known if he had sung or screamed afterwards.

When Tim Luscombe's London Gay Theatre Company declared that they intended to perform Shakespeare with a homoerotic emphasis, they were vilified by the tabloid press. The Sun responded with characteristic boorishness. Its article on the subject, headed 'All's Well That Bends Well: Trendy Theatre Gay-Writes want to do King Queer', featured a top ten of re-written Shakespearean titles including: 'Mince-summer Night's Queen', 'Tight-ass Andronicus' and 'The Fairy Wives of Windsor'. Predictably The Sun's stable-mate The Daily Star, followed suit. Its heading read: 'Hail, Good Sir - What a Gay Play' and the article continued with manifest hyperbole, 'Lecherous Henry VIII will be turning in his grave as his six wives are transformed into RENT BOYS.' It also contained a list of play titles which included 'Butch Ado About Nothing' and the inexcusably weak 'As Hugh Likes It!' As if to distance their own readers from this depraved version of the Bard, both stories appeared on page three alongside 'Curvey Kirsten' and Gayner Goodman. The latter model was described as touring with a theatre group - 'Let's hope our London beauty studies her lines. After all, everyone else does.'

---

112 'Male as Female', p. 5.

Press attention to the London Gay Theatre Company was, fortunately, not limited to the tabloids. A front page piece in The Independent had raised the issue the previous day and The Times noted the controversy in its editorial which, however, included the surreal assertion that 'Shakespeare is a misty ocean in which elephants can swim and lambs can paddle!' For The Times the embarrassment of the controversy could be laid to rest with the aid of the transcendental affirmation that the plays 'can survive the quirks and obsessions of their contemporary directors.... Never mind the bias of directors. Go for the words, and find whatever you want there, with pleasure. The old fellow is a manifesto for all seasons.' In contrast to this essentialising faith in the plays' textual authority, Luscombe is unashamed about his theatrical appropriation of this powerful cultural totem. He sees the necessity of gay Shakespearean production as an antidote to the limitations of traditional theatre:

---

114 The Sun, 11 January 1992. Ironically, while the paper asserted that 'Bard buffs were aghast last night, fearing productions like Antonia and Cleopatra and even Macbent', it continued with the most misplaced assertion that 'Coriolanus would be alright.' (Presumably the author overlooked the possible joke on ansel.) In a piece of correspondence, Luscombe informed me that As You Like It and Coriolanus were in fact the two plays he would most like to do. (27 October 1992.)

Because one feels excluded from so much of society one also feels excluded from an appreciation of Shakespeare because all the plays one sees of Shakespeare, or at least nearly all the productions one sees of Shakespeare, are 'heterosexualist' ... and ... as a gay director, working with a gay company, I feel like grabbing him back to redress the balance.

The cultural struggle for the possession of Shakespeare is on - Luscombe's Hamlet will contravene Section 28 if presented in a publicly subsidised theatre - and an informed awareness of the issues surrounding the various modalities of sexuality in the early modern period as well as those raised by the dramatic practice of male transvestism can serve only to broaden and complicate, in a positive way, the parameters of such a struggle. As Alan Sinfield notes ironically:

> As the ultimate genius-artist, Shakespeare speaks to man, and if lesbians and gays are let in on that, why, they will be wanting civil rights next.

At the time of writing both the age of consent for homosexual intercourse and the question of the decriminalisation of homosexuality in the forces are under review. Shakespeare, if justly deployed, constitutes one of the most empowering tools for undoing pernicious and destructive prejudice. In its fidelity to the dramaturgical procedures of Shakespeare's time and in its self-conscious complication of erotic practices, playing with boys (as Cheek by Jowl demonstrated) may contribute to the development of a society in which the cultural construction of the Bard as a 'normal' heterosexual, is perceived to be an ideological mythology.

---

117 Ibid.
118 Correspondence with the author, 27 October 1992.
Shakemyth

The Fabrication of Shakespearean Culture

At the end of Edward Bond's play Bingo, first performed in 1973, William Shakespeare takes an overdose. The play ends with the Bard convulsing on the floor and his daughter Judith ransacking his bed for the final version of his will. Bond's Shakespeare is a corrupt businessman, who colludes with the system of enclosure which evicts the poor and persecutes the dispossessed. In a scene earlier in the play, he drinks himself unconscious in the presence of his candid and truculent contemporary, Ben Jonson. He is tired, 'Time goes. I'm surprised how old I've got.' He is a sullen and silent figure. In reply to Jonson's questions about the meaning of The Winter's Tale, and his present writings, Shakespeare can only respond with negative utterances.

Jons: What are you writing?
Shak: Nothing.
They drink
Jons: Not writing?
Shak: No.
Jons: Why not?
Shak: Nothing to say.
Jons: Doesn't stop others. Written out?
Shak: Yes.
They drink

Jons: Now, what are you writing?
Shak: Nothing. ¹

In the preface to the play, Bond discusses the historical changes he made to some of the dates and personages in Shakespeare's biography.

I made all these changes for dramatic convenience. To recreate in an audience the impact scattered events had on someone's life you often have to concentrate them. I mention all this because I want to protect the play from petty criticism. It is based on the material historical facts as far as they're known, and on psychological truth so far as I know it.... Of course, I can't insist that my description of Shakespeare's death is true. I'm like a man who looks down from a bridge at the place where an accident has happened. The road is wet, there's a skid-mark, the car's wrecked, and a dead man lies by the road in a pool of blood. I can only put the various things together and say what probably happened. Orthodox critics usually assume that Shakespeare would have driven a car so well that he'd never have an accident. ²

Bond confesses that he is not in the business of constructing anything like a life story or a biographical study. ³ In his departure from historical veracity for the sake of dramatic effect, Bond has the precedent of Shakespeare's own work. As is well-known, Shakespeare substantially reduced the age of Hotspur to effect a dramatic contrast with Hal in I Henry IV and he increased the age of Queen Isabel in Richard II to enable him to construct a romantic sympathy at the couple's enforced separation. The reason why Bond is so determined to protect his play from the charge of historical inaccuracy or, as he calls it, petty criticism is that, for Bond, Shakespeare is not a person but a site of competing theories about the role of the artist in society and the interconnections of history and literature, 'Part of the play' he says, 'is about the relationship between any writer and his society.'

² Ibid., pp. 3 - 4.
³ He writes, 'I admit that I'm not really interested in Shakespeare's true biography in the way a historian might be.' Ibid., p. 4.

For Garry O'Connor, who reviewed the production at the Royal Court in 1974 (in which the celebrated Shakespearean actor, Sir John Gielgud, played the Bard), Shakespeare, as Bond's play portrayed him, was the victim of a terrible smear campaign. Bond's progress, he wrote, as a playwright is from the direct, cold-blooded infanticide of Saved, to the more refined literary assassination of King Lear (a mythological figure of English culture), and now, in Bingo, the more abstract assassination of Shakespeare's reputation (a writer who lived a blameless life, happened to be gifted with genius, and probably believed in original sin).

For O'Connor, Bond's work constitutes an attack, not merely on the person of the Bard; but as if that was not bad enough, on the Bard's greatest play, King Lear. Bond's version of the play, Lear (first performed in 1971) is particularly violent. Bond admitted that the play was full of what he called, 'aggro-effects'. He claimed that these effects corresponded to the Verfremdung effects in the plays of Brecht. They needed to be all the more shocking than instances of Brecht's alienation effect, however, because these have become politically etiolated:

Alienation is vulnerable to the audience's decision about it. Sometimes it is necessary to emotionally commit the audience - which is why I have aggro-effects. Without this the V-effect can deteriorate into an aesthetic style. Brecht then becomes 'our Brecht' in the same sloppy patriotic way that Shakespeare becomes 'our Shakespeare'. I've seen good German audiences in the stalls chewing their

---

4 Ibid., p. 4.
In Lear and in Bingo, Bond is concerned to prevent Shakespeare becoming 'our Shakespeare'. As he says, he finds this sloppy and patriotic. O'Connor's completely unsubstantiated assumptions that Shakespeare lived a 'blameless life', and his curiously inapposite claim that he 'probably believed in original sin', not to mention the blithe attribution of 'genius' to him - an attribution that is loaded with all kinds of implications - is precisely the kind of sloppiness to which Bond (and Brecht before him) is so vehemently opposed. The kinds of cultural assumptions that underpin O'Connor's admiration of Shakespeare, make him one of those 'Orthodox critics' who, in Bond's words, 'usually assume that Shakespeare would have driven a car so well that he'd never have an accident.'

I want, in the course of this chapter, to dismantle the values inscribed at the centre of the theoretical position of these 'Orthodox critics', to lay bare the issues surrounding the processes by which, according to Bond, Shakespeare has become 'our Shakespeare' and to account for the unwritten assumption that the plays of the Renaissance, and especially those of Shakespeare, constitute the formula-one of literary driving. Bond's driving metaphor is a useful one in terms of pedagogy. The degree that students pursue has of course to be conducted in compliance with a highway code, according to which some literary practices are 'safer' than others while still others are downright dangerous. Eventually their acquisition of these, is tested in an academic driving test - an examination - which examines not only their knowledge of the highway code (by allowing them to regurgitate information that they have previously digested, in the form of an essay) but, by compelling them to examine a chunk of text there and then, evaluates their dexterity in performing a set critical manoeuvre.

---

The reason why this driving metaphor is peculiarly apposite is because, like the golden rule of driving on the left, the selection of Shakespeare as our literary Rolls Royce is explicably arbitrary. We could, as long as we all did it at the same moment, cross the central reservation and drive from that moment on, on the right. There is nothing more inherently valuable in the writings of Shakespeare than there is right in driving on the left. Although the canon of Shakespeare’s writings, his range of genres, and his variety of styles is greater (in the sense of ‘larger’) than that of say, Marlowe, that does not necessarily mean that it is greater (in the sense of ‘better’). Shakespeare has become the ultimate driving machine, not because he is intrinsically superior to Marlowe or anyone else, but because he is revered as such. Although this reverence started early, it has not always been as powerful as at present. Indeed Shakespeare has been deliberately engineered as both a theatrical and educational vehicle for specific social, cultural and political purposes. In both the dramatic and auto-matic senses, Shakespeare is the product of a particular kind of workshop.

For the purposes of this discussion, I am going to differentiate between Shakespeare, the Renaissance dramatist and theatre owner and what I am going to call Shakemyth which is the complex of cultural ideas surrounding the plays, the social institutions through which they are re-presented, and the mythologised persona of Shakespeare. It is clear that while O’Connor is apparently referring to the playwright, he is really drawing on the shared cultural assumptions about Shakemyth. Ideas about universality, that the plays say

---

7 See for example, Jonson’s and Milton’s eulogistic poems on Shakespeare. Jonson’s is discussed in chapter VI.
something to all people, at all times, that the playwright is in some mysterious way Everyman, are central to the construction of Shakemyth. For Christopher Hampton this 'essentially mythical and fixed order of things ... is ... nothing but a mystifying absurdity.' According to its prevalent analysis, the plays deal with aspects of 'human nature' which apparently have gone unchanged for the last four hundred years and, according to this analysis, show no sign of changing. People are dangerously reduced, in this scheme of things to static essential characteristics. They comprise jealousy, goodness, hypocrisy, nobility, frivolity, self-deceit, love, courage, malevolence and so on and so on. According to the principles of Shakemyth, the plays of Shakespeare are, above all else, relevant and they are about us. When I dared to suggest at a public lecture in 1990 at the Leicester Haymarket Theatre that The Taming of the Shrew was an anti-feminist play and that, before we produced it as a 'play for today', we might be wise to consider it in the light of Renaissance ideas about women, Alison Sutcliffe, the director, told me that it was a play about love not about hate, and that 'anyway, I don't think women really know what they want.' Shakespeare, according to the famous study by Jan Kott is 'our contemporary'; and any suggestion that the plays might be fruitfully approached by our becoming one of Shakespeare's contemporaries is anathema to many thespians. 'Shakespeare himself was a theatre practitioner,' they tell you angrily, 'and you academics always pick him to pieces instead of allowing him to live and breathe!' Perhaps the most offensive and shallow example of this insular arrogance is that of Charles Marowitz who begins his Recycling Shakespeare with the sentence, 'This book is directed at two enemies - the academics and the traditionalists.' Repeatedly Marowitz

---

8 Christopher Hampton, The Ideology of the Text (Milton Keynes, 1990), p. 29.
9 On the importance of 'human nature' to traditional critics of tragedy and especially A. C. Bradley, see chapter III.
10 Kate Nicholls, the actress who played Kate in the same production, took my remarks as a personal attack and I was asked by the theatre to meet and talk to her. Needless to say, we did not agree about the play!
insists on his empirical theatrical wisdom, distinguishing it from fusty scholarship: 'Unlike the views of scholars or critics, mine have evolved from hands-on experiences with several of Shakespeare's plays'. One of his chapters is headed 'Free Shakespeare! Jail Scholars!' and Marowitz is insistent about the ineptitude or sheer laziness of academics who consistently fail to emerge from their carpeted studies: 'The professors never have to get on their feet at all'. Marowitz continues to reproduce the most callow and ignorant stereotypes about ivory-tower academics challenging what he asserts is their sheltered naiveté with his own hard-nosed expertise based on years of theatrical experience. In this posturing and crude attack, he succeeds only in calling into question his own intelligence:

In Academe, wanking is a full-time job, and teaching others how to wank, a sign of intellectual respectability. The yardstick of successful wanking, if you are a professor or lecturer, is the number of periodicals which will allow you to wank for them in public; if you are a critic, the number of books devoted to wanking which will be circulated to other members of the cult, and the amount of notoriety your wanks will incite - compared to the wanks of older and more knowledgeable hands. The crowning success of a wanker is not so much to have his wanks bound and circulated but to transfer them into the minds of non-wankers (directors) who are dealing practically with material which the wanker deals with only pornographically.

Thespians and academics rarely get on and their mutual enmity, fuelled by this kind of vituperative attack, can only surrender Shakespeare even further to an ideology which seeks to depoliticise Shakespeare both academically and theatrically. It also further compromises the institutions of theatre and education themselves. Bourgeois ideology constructs two central polarities and privileges the first term in each case: universal vs historical and individual vs social. The universal is unchangeable, connecting 1606 (the

---

12 Ibid., p. ix.
13 Ibid., p. 72.
14 Ibid., p. 73.
year of King Lear) for example with 1992 in a continuum of correctness and stability. The individual is isolated and politically neutralised as a consequence. Political practice and social change can only happen on the level of the historical and the social and neither is allowed anywhere near Shakemyth.

According to Kott's Shakespeare Our Contemporary, man is basically violent and lustful for power. Human existence is degrading and there is little hope of anything getting better. Peter Hall, who became director of the RSC in 1960, admitted to driving his productions very much under the influence of this book. Both he and his successor, Trevor Nunn, directed Shakespeare's plays (and formulated the character of the RSC as a result,) in line with Kott's dark pessimism. Both disdained the possibility for drama to be politically interventionist. Following the political turmoil of 1968, Hall expressed his contempt for 'a new generation who want to shout down all opposing opinions.' He said he wanted to direct The Tempest 'because it's all about wisdom, understanding and also resignation.' Trevor Nunn said that he was 'not a political animal' and explained that 'In most of our work now we are concerned with the human personalities of a king or queen rather than with their public roles.' Shakemyth deals not with the tragedy of state but with the psychological collapse of individuals, not with social revolution but with the passions of characters and experiences that are supposed to be recognisable by each and every one of us. It is this rejection of an engaged political position that transforms Shakespeare into Shakemyth. Humanity is basically bad, as Kott suggests, and there is very little that we can do about it. Moreover, since we are experiencing apparently the same passions, disappointments and frustrations as Hamlet, there is little to be done to change the situation. Something is rotten but the rottenness, according to Shakemyth, is not confined to Denmark.

---

In his prelude to his play Saved, Bond exposes this kind of apolitical nihilism for what it is - a reactionary and deeply political ideological position:

> The idea that human beings are necessarily violent is a political device, the modern equivalent of the doctrine of original sin. For a long time this doctrine helped to enforce the acceptance of the existing social order. For reasons the church could not explain everyone was born to eternal pain after death unless the church saved them. It carefully monopolised all the sacraments which were the only means to salvation. 18

Shakemyth promotes the idea that the plays glimpse this depressing reality and that the reason they are powerful is precisely because they express humanity's powerlessness. An active political stance is thus completely eschewed by Shakemyth. So overwhelming is this idea, that when directors or playwrights dare to suggest that Shakespeare is political they are hounded for so doing. O'Connor's reaction to Lear is typical of this. Nakedly political and interventionist productions, like those of the confrontational director Michael Bogdanov, are charged with travestying Shakespeare. In the best tradition of Orton's Edna Welthorpe, Mrs A. N. Butler wrote to the then minister for the Arts, Richard Luce to complain about the English Shakespeare Company's post-Falklands history cycle (which opened in 1986):

> Dear Mr Luce
> I wish to protest in the strongest possible terms about the performances being given by the English Shakespeare Company ... In particular, the Henry V is of such a low standard as to be quite unacceptable. For instance:

1 In the embarkation scene at Southampton a crowd of 'football hooligans' is suddenly revealed on a gantry. They unfurl a banner with 'Fuck the Frogs' in large letters....

2 'Pistol' drops his trousers and bares his bottom to the audience (squeals of girlish teenage laughter) and then sits over a sandbagged trench ostensibly to relieve himself whilst talking to the incognito King - then bares his bottom to the audience again when he gets up....

4 We have to listen, in silence, to Falstaff relieving himself (off-stage) before he appears at the Boar's Head Tavern (where 'Doll' is attired in scanty black leather and there is a creature with a Mohican hair-do.)

5 There is quite gratuitous and unnecessary violence to the French officer wounded on the field at Agincourt - repeated kicking in the groin by a supposed Medical Orderly.... What an odious example to set young people!...

I do beg you to send someone to view this subversive and indecent production before further harm is done. The leaflet is advertising for school parties, but in my opinion no children should be allowed near it - they would come away with an extraordinarily muddled view of history, and the impression that it is all right for British soldiers to shoot prisoners in the back, rob the dead, use foul language and behave like hooligans - and that in fact this is what the British army does. How dare the producers equate the heroes of Agincourt with football hooligans? And why should they be allowed to destroy our culture by knocking down our historical heroes? This is just a travesty of Shakespeare misused as a vehicle for modern pornography.... I strongly object, personally, to any part of my taxes being used to fund such an obscene and degrading performance.... I do believe that Mrs Thatcher's aim is to uphold our cultural values, and so I do hope that better control can be exercised over what is funded by taxpayers' money through the Arts Council. 19

The interesting thing about this letter, quite apart from its hectoring tone, is the assumption that if the plays were done 'straight' they would be historically accurate as though the playwright was a writer of documentaries rather than dramas. According to Shakemyth, politics, especially those of a confrontational nature, just do not belong in the theatre.

---

What has happened, according to Bond, to the oppositional state of Brecht, is that he has become appropriated by the status quo. Shorn of his politics, his alienation effect has now been reduced to a mere aesthetic. Shakespeare too has suffered this fate in the theatre though recently, a breed of young directors has emerged who are suspicious about Shakemyth. They are directors like Tim Luscombe, who directed the ESC Merchant of Venice in a way which pointed up, rather than tried to sanitise, the play's anti-Semitic content. Another would be Simon Usher who, although possessed of a tragic despondency about the awful insularity of human existence, does, in a way which strikes me as socially responsible, engage with social issues, especially to do with sexual and gender politics. It is significant that both of these directors work mostly on the fringe, or in experimental theatre. Usher has worked on new plays at The Gate and regularly at the National Theatre Studio, which exists to devise productions and, because it is not open to the public, is not dependent upon good box office for its survival. The large theatre establishments seem to produce Shakemyth rather than Shakespeare. Indeed Bond has clashed with both institutions and now prefers to see his work produced by youth and community or even student companies (e.g., Jackets II, which was produced by the Outreach department of the Leicester Haymarket as a community tour in 1989 having been premiered by students at the University of Lancaster).

Of course some political statements (i.e., the right ones or, more precisely, statements of the right) are permissible in the theatre, provided that is, they validate the social

---

20 On this production, see chapter VII.

21 For an account of an example of Usher's compelling work, see my review of his Winter's Tale, Cahiers Elisabethains, 39 (1991), pp. 84 - 86. His 1990 Pericles (Leicester Haymarket Studio) was a sustained attempt to tackle the incestuous and dangerous possibilities of the play rather than sanitise them, as is more usually the case.

22 Recently Bond said of the RSC version of his War Plays, 'I only sat through [it] because they gave me a complimentary ticket. If I'd had to pay I would have asked for my money back.' For Bond, the children of a school in Milton Keynes performed 'way beyond the abilities of the RSC.' (The Guardian, 15 October 1992.) Bond wrote of the article itself, 'It fitted me into a category of disaffected, posturing, embittered writers - and I'm not... I... find always a growing interest in what happens and in writing about it.' (Correspondence with the author, 31 October 1992.)
institutions of market capitalism. In 1975, the Duke of Edinburgh opened the RSC production of Henry V by announcing his hope that the 'marvellous spirit of the play' would inspire the courage 'to overcome the menace of rising costs and inflation in the years ahead.' 23 The Daily Express responded enthusiastically to the production, 'a gutsy, reviving production at a time of national adversity. And, boy, do we need it.' 24 Olivier's film of Henry V which went into production in 1942 and was funded by the Ministry of Information, dedicated as it is to the forces of World War II, is perhaps the best example of the political appropriation of Shakespeare. 25

The hidden agenda of Shakemyth is undeniably conservative. Richard Wilson instances the double standard of establishment critics towards the presence of politics in the theatre:

when the Young Vic began a series of radical productions in 1984, the critics savaged the approach as 'Spart-ish tosh'; complaining that David Thacker was 'tying the texts' in what one called 'a political straight-jacket', 'which in effect dares to tell Shakespeare what he was writing about'. The productions were dismissed as 'well-staged but wrong-headed', since it was nothing less than an 'atrocity' to expose the impressionable young to such 'unashamedly political left-wing comic strip simplifications'. 'Is the theatre the place', one critic demanded, 'for political statements?'

Yet a few hundred yards away on the South Bank, the National Theatre's Coriolanus was being hailed as 'a triumph', precisely because, it seemed, its director, Peter Hall, had realised Shakespeare's burning political relevance. What this meant was spelt out in The Daily Telegraph, where Hall was praised for a staging that 'transcends logic to underline the political topicality of a play about the threat to democracy when workers are misled by troublemakers'. 26

---

24 Ibid., p. 173.
Hall's Coriolanus, produced in the year of the miners' strike, was a production which condemned political revolution. The only acceptable theatrical politics, according to Shakemyth, are those that maintain the hegemony of the dominant culture and yet, this is a particularly paradoxical state of affairs considering we are talking not about literature but drama.

In his book Marxism and Literature, Raymond Williams contends that Literature 'did not emerge earlier than the eighteenth century and was not fully developed until the nineteenth century.' In this sense then, Shakespeare's plays are pre-literary. In addition to what may appear to be merely a taxonomic technicality, Shakespeare's plays are profoundly unliterary in another way. They are, as this thesis has insisted throughout, dramatic texts, performance pieces and like other performance arts (music, dance, opera etc.), they exist solely at the moment of their performance. They are not like novels, pieces of sculpture or paintings which can be read and re-read, read backwards, interrupted, slowed down, speeded up by the reader/viewer. All plays are mediated to us by a director, designer, lighting designer, actors, stage managers, production managers, producers, theatre architects, programme compilers etc., etc. The reception of the play, which will influence the way we view it, will be affected by the reviewers, censorship, technical possibilities of the space, ticket price, time of performance, publishing rights etc., etc. Indeed, whether or not we ever get the chance to see the play is a decision taken by Arts Council drama officers and regional arts development officers. Drama is inherently socially produced. Even a small-scale production of the size of those presented in a studio theatre may easily involve over a hundred people. Nowhere is the death of the author more apparent than in drama.

---

One solution to the embarrassing problem that Shakespeare's plays are not really Literature (and it is a solution that thespians and academics alike are guilty of), is simply to ignore it. The polysemic nature of dramatic representation is comfortably fossilised when one says, 'Shakespeare is the greatest poet of the English language.' If we treat the plays as poetry, we can turn them into Literature. T. S. Eliot was perhaps the most extreme example of this, asserting that all 36 plays formed 'one poem'. In English departments, we fetishise the text. We decode it in an absolute way rather than revalue it from production to production. Student theatre trips are always more bona fide when organised by a Drama rather than an English department. The text tends to be far more 'closed' in English departments. Indeed the bad theatre reviewer is one who has made up his or her mind about the play on the strengths of the text, one who has decoded the play on the basis of the script rather than accepting what the particular production was trying to do and then assessing its success or otherwise. But in the study of a playwright, we ignore the institutions of the theatre at our peril.

II

The worst of it is, I can't read Shakespeare any more, so I have to remember the old tags. Not that I think him a bad author, particularly, but I can't bear literature. This distaste must be watched, or they'll turn me out. It's their money I want, so I suppose I've got to go on and be an old mechanical hack on rusty wires, working up a stock enthusiasm for the boyish lingo of effusive gentlemen long since dead. I always said no good would come of poetry.

Education is the other major ideological state apparatus through which the values of Shakemyth are promoted. In particular the discipline of 'Eng. Lit.' is constructed around the central figure of Shakespeare and takes its value from him. Shakespeare's position at the centre of our national literature and language is unassailable. It is Touchstone in As You Like It, who remarks that 'the truest poetry is the most feigning' (III. iii. 19). In this sense Shakespeare is the true touchstone of Literature. Longman's catalogue of academic titles (1991 - 92) is culturally ratified by a picture of the Bard on its cover: 'Discover the world of Longman literature' (plate Q). Shakespeare's poetry is true - true for all time and for all men (the use of men is deliberate) - but, as is the case in the large national theatre institutions, it is the most feigning because, when transformed in the alembic of cultural mediation into Shakemyth, it protests its political neutrality while it ensures the continued promulgation of a society that is profoundly unegalitarian in terms of class and gender. The State finances schools, sets syllabuses, trains teachers, and requires pupils to attend by law. Recently, the National Curriculum has eroded the schools' admittedly limited individual autonomy even further. A consultative paper in advance of the National Curriculum, published by the government in 1989 entitled, English for ages 5 to 16: Proposals of the Secretary of State for Education and Science, asserted the centrality of the Bard in its grand scheme of things, 'Many teachers believe that Shakespeare's work conveys universal values, and that his language expresses rich and subtle meanings beyond that of any other English writer.... almost everyone agrees that his work should be represented in a National Curriculum.' Thus, as Lesley Aers notes, while Shakespeare is only compulsory at Level Seven and above, he is still mentioned by name for examinations as low as Level Three. Following the midsummer examinations at GCSE in 1992, the Secretary of State for Education, John Pattem suggested that record achievements were the result neither of the success of teachers and administrators to accept the onerous tasks of the National Curriculum, nor simple hard work by

---

31 Lesley Aers, 'Shakespeare in the National Curriculum', in Shakespeare in the Changing Curriculum, edited by Lesley Aers schoolchildren faced now as never before with the overwhelming possibility of unemployment unless they are high achievers; rather Pattn attacked an exam which, he alleged, had gone soft on academic standards. In an attempt to restore what he considered to be the correct degree of difficulty, a return as he put it, to 'real education', Pattn ordered that for the next three years, all fourteen-year-olds must face tests on A Midsummer Night's Dream, Romeo and Juliet, or Julius Caesar. Nigel de Gruchy, leader of the National Association of Schoolmasters and Union of Women Teachers, responded, 'It is extremely limiting and dictatorship of the curriculum. It will be fine for some pupils, hard work for some and disastrous for others.' Pattn's totalitarian cultural enterprise will obviously alienate not only teachers but the pupils that they are forced to force through these texts with a consequent demoralising effect. Pattn's decree has less to do with a personal enthusiasm for the Bard than the equation of Shakespeare with High Culture which, whether you like it or not, is damn well good for you! At the 1992 Tory party conference, Pattn savaged an examination board who had used a hamburger advert in one of its questions. Whatever next?, he asked, 'Chaucer with chips? Milton with mayonnaise? I want William Shakespeare in our classrooms, not Ronald McDonald.'

From its inception, the standardisation of literature revolved around the teaching of Shakespeare. As early as 1921, the Newbolt report spelt out the unavoidable presence of the Bard, 'Shakespeare is an inevitable and necessary part of school activity because he is ... our greatest English writer.' The report goes on to express a powerful nostalgia for

---

33 The Guardian, 8 October 1992. Pattn continued in a tone which was a mixture of provocation and threat, 'I have a message for those exam boards. Listen very carefully. I will say this only once. Get your act together.'
34 Cited by Derek Longhurst, 'Not for all time, but for an Age: an approach to Shakespeare Studies', in Re-Reading English, edited by Peter Widdowson (London, 1982), 150 - 163, p. 150.
the Elizabethan period as a lost Golden Age of literary and social creativity. It was an organic society, which was apparently ordered, happy and secure: 'It was no inglorious time of our history that Englishmen delighted altogether in dance and song and drama, nor were these pleasures the privilege of a few or a class.' The fact that this was the period in which subversive dramatists could find themselves thrown into prison (as happened to Ben Jonson), the period in which actors were little more than vagrants, the period in which capital punishment could take the form of public disembowelling, is glossed over in this image of indulgent merriemaking. This is the England not of Shakespeare but of Shakemyth.

Studies of the plays like Tillyard's Elizabethan World Picture (1943) and Shakespeare's History Plays (1944) promote the image of Shakespeare as spokesman for ideas of hierarchy and political stasis. Shakemyth is pro-royalist, anti-civil war and vehemently, chauvinistically patriotic (as Bond noted above). Moreover, in the chaos of the Second World War, this is an ideological position that these studies repeatedly endorse. Like the theatre, conservative criticism is happier with Shakemyth than Shakespeare. The literary virtues that critics like Tillyard and Traversi value are wholeness, unity, textual and human coherence. Traversi, in an essay on King Lear, protested that it was a 'great play precisely because it is a play about human "nature" before being a play about the abuses of government or social inequality.' Plays that challenge social inequality (i.e., socialist plays), are 'political' not 'natural' (i.e., conservative). In an infamous interview in 1983, the then chancellor, Nigel Lawson, asserted Shakespeare's Conservative

---

36 This kind of historical sentimentalism is mercilessly sent up in Jim Dixon's drunken lecture at the climax of Amis's Lucky Jim: The point about Merrie England is that it was about the most un-Merrie period in our history. It's only the home-made pottery crowd, the organic husbandry crowd, the recorder-playing crowd, the Esperanto... Dixon keels over! (London, 1954), p. 231.

37 Cited by Longhurst, 'Not for all time, but for an Age', p. 156. For similar ideas about human 'nature' with reference to Othello, see the discussion of A. C. Bradley in chapter III.
credentials. Citing Ulysses's speech on the virtue of 'degree' (Troilus and Cressida, I. iii. 80ff), he went on to remark, 'People are different, not equal.... The fact of differences, and the need for some kind of hierarchy ... are expressed more powerfully there than anywhere else I know in literature.... Shakespeare was a Tory without any doubt.... Coriolanus [is] written from a Tory point of view.... Man doesn't change. Or man's nature doesn't change. The same problems are there in different forms.'

Lawson offers another Hobbesian instance of the negative presumption of man's iniquity and the necessity of a rigorously structured social hierarchy.

The nationalism implicit in Newbolt's statement that Shakespeare is 'our greatest English writer' is commonplace in criticism of the first half of this century. F. R. Leavis in one of his usual lamentations on the degraded nature of modern society noted that Shakespeare had written at a period when, unlike that of his own time, 'national culture [was] rooted in the soil'. This organicist ideal finds its explicit formulation in the suggestion that the language of the Bard is English at its most glorious; merely reading the plays aloud will teach children 'correct' or 'standard English'. In 1917, Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch wrote that reading aloud 'just lets the author - Chaucer or Shakespeare or Milton or Coleridge - have his own way with the young plant - just lets them drop "like the gentle rain from heaven", and soak in.' Despite the quaint formulation, this is not an antiquated notion, an old-fashioned hang-up of pre-war Oxbridge dons. In December 1989 the Prince of Wales contrasted the present 'dismal wasteland of banality, cliché, and casual obscenity' with the language of Hamlet. More recently, attacking the modish translation of the Bible in use in some current Churches, John Gummer (himself a member of the general synod), remarked: 'At the very moment the Government is reintroducing Shakespeare into our schools, the Church of England continues to use the language of Jeffrey Archer.'

In 1981, this idea of linguistic and thus cultural ascendancy dangerously underlined Lord Scarman's explanation of the social discontent, that found expression in the Brixton riots. For Scarman, the linguistic inabilities of immigrants' children were clearly to blame:

> the primary object of schooling must be to prepare all our children, whatever their colour, for life in Britain. It is essential therefore, that children should leave school able to speak, read and write effectively in the language of British society, i.e., English.

Of course, English is now only one of the languages that British society speaks. Scarman's apparently liberal attempt to empower an underclass is, nevertheless, based upon a chilling hegemonic assumption which demonstrates that it is not just Caliban that is forced to learn the grammar of the white ruling-classes.

Despite the cultural prejudice of Conservative policy on the teaching of Shakespeare and the intention to limit Shakespearean study to a mere three plays, the playwright is, fortunately, represented more widely in Higher Education. In a random sample of prospectuses for 1993 entry to various institutions of higher education, 70% specified at least one whole course on Shakespeare. The University of Lancaster for example listed, 'Shakespeare', 'Shakespeare and Elizabethan Language', and 'Renaissance Poetry and Prose'. Royal Holloway and Bedford New College required first year papers in 'Literature 1525 - 1660' as well as 'Shakespeare'. Oxford Polytechnic ran courses in 'Medieval and Renaissance Drama' and 'Shakespeare'. To get into all these universities and colleges to study English, however, it is usually necessary to obtain an English A level. In most cases, a third of the examination (usually one whole paper) is dedicated to Shakespeare. The con-trick of English, to students who have come through that particular exam, ought by now to be plain. On the one hand, teachers and lecturers will offer students carte blanche to formulate their own opinions. Expressions like, 'Your interpretations are as valid as mine', or 'I don't know the answers any more than you do' will be familiar to graduates and undergraduates alike. Varieties of interpretation are supposed to be equally valid. In fleeing from the bludgeoning autocracy (most would say tyranny) of Leavis and the Scrutineers and under the impact of post-structuralist relativity, English teachers and lecturers have become terrified of being seen to impose authoritarian verdicts. Yet, at the same time as they are protesting their ignorance, they are editing student editions and writing critical books, setting and marking examination papers. All interpretations are equal, but some are more equal than others! Is this an act of notorious bad faith? Bernard Bergonzi believes that it is:

---

42 Cited in Shakespeare in the Changing Curriculum, p. 5.
43 The Guardian, 17 July 1992. The irony of the attack, on one of the Tory old retainers, presumably masks an internecine political agenda.

it is disingenuous for academics to pretend that they can participate in ... discussion on terms of complete equality with their students, for there are questions of power and authority involved; at the end of the day, grades and marks, assessing and examining, come into the picture. Students do not forget these overshadowing realities even if academics, caught up in the euphoria of a 'really lively discussion', sometimes do. 45

Social Shakespeare: IX

Lecturers protest too much that there are no right answers and yet, there is something that the examiners know, that the study guides know and that the exam papers are designed to elicit and, if students read the study guides and are successful in the exams, they too will have been initiated in its mysteries.

Just as Shakespeare forms the touchstone of Eng. Lit., so English functions as a touchstone for all academic study. The student's shortcomings in relation to literature are taken to be a reflection of his/her general intellectual capacity. An ability to 'respond' to literature is taken to be an indication of the student's sensitivity and intelligence. No other single academic subject has such a generalising consequence. As David Pascall, the educational adviser who chairs the National Curriculum council put it, 'English is the most important national curriculum subject. It provides the foundation for all future learning and for success in later life.'

46 A qualification in English is compulsory for entrance into teaching, higher education, the civil service and so on. Despite all of this, the study of Shakespeare does not seem to be in the pupil's best interest. Very obviously, most of the literary texts prescribed at A level reinforce, in the ways that I have been trying to demonstrate, the values and ideological positions of patriarchy and market capitalism. Secondly, the entrance requirement of Higher Education to study English is much higher than that to study a science. At the time of writing Nene College, Northampton required two A level grades at C C, to read English while an applicant for Science was typically asked for two Es. English at undergraduate level is also predominantly a female's subject. Ever since its foundation it has been reserved for the 'lesser intellects' of women while their male counterparts studied Classics. There is still something suspect about male undergraduates. They are doing a 'girlie' subject, they are seen as 'arts poofs', why can't they do something useful? A recent piece in Punch exploited the popular image of English students as dilettantes who sit around and chat about books. It also sent up the justification of such study which claims that English is 'relevant' (notice that word again) or that it teaches useful inter-personal skills!

The Guardian, 10 September 1992. Pascall went on to emphasise the importance of speaking standard English and urged teachers, even while on playground duty, to correct pupils who speak sloppily!

A major row erupted last night over the set books announced for next year's A-level examinations. The books include Spotty Dog Goes To The Beach, Postman Pat Goes To The Toilet, and A Is For Apple, B Is For Bear. These replace last year's choices, Middlemarch, Volpone, and Paradise Lost.... A government spokesman denied that the new A-level choices reflect a 'drop in standards'. He said: These books are much more relevant to the lives of today's school students. We are not looking simply for the ability to read, but to develop inter-personal communications skills such as the ability to turn the pages and look at the pictures. 47

While I have talked about the institutions of theatre and education separately, it is very necessary to point out that they enjoy a symbiotic relationship. In fact, to put it more crudely, they are mutually parasitic. Course contents in Higher Education will be decided according to what is on in the region. In 1988 Leicester University taught the History plays as the core texts of its Shakespeare course which coincided with the RSC production of the Plantagenets. In 1990, at Nene College, I chose to do Edward II knowing that my students could see this rarely performed piece in the same term that they were reading it. My choice of Tamburlaine for the same course in 1992 was influenced by the play's contemporaneous production at the RSC.

Conversely, while they would never admit it, theatres are guided in their programming by A level syllabuses. Study days and outreach events attached to productions generate a large student box office while proselytising for a future audience. Shakespeare, because of the education market, is generally good business. The Leicester Haymarket's 1991 Studio production of The Winter's Tale was completely sold out, even before it opened. In the same year, the Sheffield Crucible replaced The Revenger's Tragedy with As You Like It in their autumn programme because, in the words of Mark Brickman, the theatre's unusually candid artistic director, 'all the indications suggest a fairly chilly autumn, and frankly we'd be taking a bit of a flyer with a play that doesn't really exist in the public's consciousness. We don't want to find at Christmas that we've come a financial cropper.' Of course, 'public consciousness' may be translated more accurately as the demands of further education. Pattyn's desire to see only three Shakespearean plays taught in schools as part of the National Curriculum could have a disastrous effect on the theatre industry. Presumably the most viable plays will now be Julius Caesar, A Midsummer Night's Dream or Romeo and Juliet. The theatre-going public may well find their choice of plays drastically limited.

---

III

Earlier I made what some might consider to be the extreme claim that Shakespeare validates a dominant ideology and that moreover, he is implicated in the promulgation of market capitalism. In The Shakespeare Myth, edited by Graham Holderness, is a collection of photographs of consumer products on which Shakespeare appears. These products include Flower's Bitter, Tesco Sherry, and Carling Black Label. In each of these examples, Shakespeare's appearance (either his head or his name) functions to validate the product. On the £20 note his appearance, like that of the sovereign, stamps the note with a credit credibility. 'The fortunate holder of a Shakespeareanised banknote possesses both monetary wealth and aesthetic richness; and by virtue of that possession is integrated, both materially and culturally, into the dominant ideology of a monetarist society. Shakespeare was the first historical figure to be pictured on a British banknote outside royalty. As Nigel Wheale puts it, Shakespeare's is 'a name from a cultural register being transposed to the cash register.' He was recently replaced by the scientist Michael Faraday. The poet Simon Rae wittily expressed the Bard's disgust at being usurped from the £20 note:

---

O from what power hast thou this powerful might,
To push my visage from its wonted place,
And make a lot of folk at Stratford quite uptight?
And who will recognise your obscure face?
Electro-magnetism makes you shine,
But quote me one thing that you said or wrote
That people can remember - just a line
That warrants your appearance on MY note.
You can't, of course you can't. It's true that time
Hath at his back a wallet or a purse
For has-beens, but I really thought my rhyme
Would save me from oblivion - or worse
There is more brilliance in my slightest play
Than in a myriad light-bulbs, Faraday.

Although the Bard has been ousted from the banknote, he has, in a sense, been promoted; he now appears in hologram form on the National Westminster Bank's cheque guarantee card, known as the Bardcard! Shakemyth is a good investment because Shakespeare, through the efforts of the theatrical and educational systems, has been carefully constructed to promote the ideologies of the dominant culture. In this respect, it is no accident that the subtitle of Bond's play with which we started is Scenes of Money and Death.

50 Shakespeare in the Changing Curriculum, p. 2.

Shakemyth is so powerful that even when it is parodied it is rarely subverted. In Blackadder, when Rowan Atkinson despairs, 'As private parts are we to the gods, they play with us for their sport', the comedy lies in our recognition of the echo of Gloucester's stoicism. Miranda Richardson's Queenie is funny exactly because she is so far from the received ideas of dignity and glory of the mythologised Astraea. This comedy is parodic but never subversive. When Dame Edna waxes lyrical about the Bard it is her petit-bourgeois pretensions that Barrie Humphries is sending up not Shakemyth itself:

> This is the Globe, darlings. Isn't it wonderful, the Globe! It's oozing, ravaged, riddled with pageantry and pomp. The history here! Little Shakespeare himself used to jump around on this stage, dressed up as a woman most of the time, not that that proves a thing these days. The thing is - I've got a lot of time for Shakespeare, a lot of time. I love his shows - To Be or Not to Be, Lend Me Your Ear, Paint Your Wagon.

Shakespeare validates the comedy just as he validates the £20 or Carling Black Label. Occasionally, this parodic element comes full circle and finds its place in a theatrical production. In Luscombe's 1991 ESC Volpone, as Politic Would-Be experienced his tortoise-shell come-uppance, he rolled himself resignedly onto his back and smoked a Hamlet cigar while the music from the advertisement played over the top. Even parodies involving Shakespeare reinforce Shakemyth.

The question with which I want to conclude is where do we go from here? If Shakemyth is so deeply entrenched and so ideologically unsound, why do we continue to teach Shakespeare? If examination papers are simply a test of conformity to the values of Shakemyth why do we continue to set and mark them? Several of my colleagues at Nene College proclaim Shakespeare as the unmoveable epitome of reactionary culture, the representation of white, male, middle-class power. They argue that Shakespeare is 'difficult' and that texts from the early modern period are too distant to be 'relevant' to the experience of most modern students. It is an approach which generates a vicious circle of low expectations. Students, told that Shakespeare is 'difficult', begin to believe that he really is so. Under the kind of syllabus that this approach brings about, students graduate with degrees in English, having read nothing written before 1800 (Medieval literature has long since vanished). These course 'developments' are unsurprisingly sponsored by those academics who themselves specialise in the literature of the twentieth century and it is tempting to suggest that their opposition is in direct proportion to their reluctance to attend voluntarily a play by Shakespeare! This kind of problem is acute in institutions like Nene because Colleges and Polytechnics have traditionally stressed vocational skills, information technology, popular culture, etc., at the expense of literature. Moreover, more time is spent on basic writing and language work than in the universities, where it is less needed, which squeezes the timetable still further.

Those academics keen to see the back of courses in Renaissance literature, confuse Shakespeare and Shakemyth. The way forward is not to ditch Shakespeare or even Shakemyth, but to unravel it, to expose its apparent disinterestedness as profoundly ideological. Every version of Shakespeare is a version; neither closer nor further from the ever-elusive (because finally absent) 'truth' than any other. This entire thesis is only one interpretation but it is uniquely one - as every performance of a Shakespearean role is uniquely one. No two theses or performances, are ever the same, because each interpretation is conditioned by the singular circumstances of the individual author, director, academic, actor, etc. As Jean I. Marsden writes, 'Scrutinised dispassionately, every act of interpretation can be seen as an act of appropriation - making sense of a literary artefact by fitting it into our own parameters. The literary work thus becomes ours; we possess it by reinventing it as surely as if we had secured its physical presence by force': Shakespeare reinvented rather than Shakespeare essentialised - or, even worse - Shakespeare abandoned. 53 This reinventing of Shakespeare will occur inevitably, unavoidably at each visit to a theatre, at each reading of a play; and - perhaps most encouragingly - it will occur in as many different ways as there are students in a class. Shakemyth will not go away any more than Shakespeare will, but a clear distinction between the two, and an understanding of their relationship, will enable the student to appreciate the ideological and cultural con-trick of Shakemyth. The most dangerous procedure would be to abandon the plays altogether, to give up teaching them to our students for if we cease working with the plays, we surrender them to the dominant ideology and the insidious myths of Shakemyth. They will remain totems of Englishness, of human nature, essential and universal, unchangeable and therefore rigidly orthodox.

In his preface to his play, The Fool, Bond explains the fallacious permanence of 'human nature':

We don't have a fixed nature in the way other animals do. We have a 'gap' left by our freedom from the captive nature of other animals, from the tight control of instincts. The gap is filled by culture. Human nature is in fact human culture.

---

If we accept this equivalence between nature and culture, we may change the former by deconstructing the latter. To explode Shakemyth is therefore to revolutionise not simply an aspect of our theatre, our educational system, or Eng. Lit., but because of the centrality of Shakemyth in all of these, it is to interrogate radically the very foundations on which Shakemyth is constructed. If we shake the myth of Shakemyth, we inevitably revolutionise our culture.

---

54 Plays: Three, p. 72.
Bibliography
Primary Sources

Unless otherwise stated the place of publication is London

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Aquinas</td>
<td>The Summa Theologica, translated by fathers of the English Dominican Province, second edition, 22 vols (1920)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bacon, Francis</td>
<td>The Essays, introduced by Michael J. Hawkins (1973)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barnfield, Richard</td>
<td>Poems 1594 - 1598, edited by Edward Arber (Birmingham, 1883)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beard, Thomas</td>
<td>The Theatre of Gods Judgements: Or, A Collection of Histo-ries out of Sacred, Ecclesiasticall and pro-phane Authors, concerning the admirable Judge-ments of God upon the transgressours of his commandments (1597)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bible</td>
<td>The Authorised Version 1611, introduced by Alfred W. Pollard (1911)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Selected Writings, edited by Sir Geoffrey Keynes (1968)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bunyan, John</td>
<td>The Pilgrim's Progress, edited by Roger Sharrock (Harmondsworth, 1965)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Burton, Robert</td>
<td>The Anatomy of Melancholy (Liverpool, 1849)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Caesar, Philip</td>
<td>A General Discovse Against the damnable sect of Vsurers (1578)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Camden, William</td>
<td>Britain (1610)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Author</td>
<td>Title</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------------------</td>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Carew, Thomas</td>
<td>Britannia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Remaines of a Greater Work Concerning Britain</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cromwell, Oliver</td>
<td>Speeches, edited by Ivan Roots</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Culpeper, Nicholas</td>
<td>A Directory for Midwives: or A Guide for Women, In their Conception,</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Bearing; And Suckling, their Children. Newly Corrected from many gross Errors</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Earle, John</td>
<td>Micro-cosmographie, Or a Peece of the World Discouered</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Erasmus, Desiderius</td>
<td>The Praise of Folly and Other Writings, edited by Robert M. Adams</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fenton, Roger</td>
<td>A Treatise of Vsurie</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gosson, Stephen</td>
<td>Playes Confuted in five Actions, Prouing that they are not to be suffred in a Christian common weale</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The School of Abuse, Containing a plesaunt inuictiue against Poets, Pipers, Plaiers, Lesters and such like Caterpillers of a Commonwelth, edited by Edward Arber</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Author</td>
<td>Work</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Graves, Robert</td>
<td>Wife to Mr Milton, (Harmondsworth, 1984), first published 1942</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Guilpin, Everard</td>
<td>Skialetheia or A shadowe of Truth, in certaine Epigrams and Satyres (1598)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Harington, John</td>
<td>An Apologie (1596)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The Letters and Epigrams of Sir John Harington, edited by Egbert McClure (Philadelphia, 1930)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>A Nevv Discourse of a Stale Sviect, Called the Metamorphosis of Aiax (1596)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The School of Salernum, edited by Francis R. Packard (1970)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Vlysses upon Aiax (1596)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Herrick, Robert</td>
<td>The Poetical Works, edited by F. W. Moorman (Oxford, 1921)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Heywood, Thomas</td>
<td>An Apology for Actors. Containing three brief Treatises. 1 Their Antiquity 2 Their ancient Dignity 3 The true vse of their quality (1612)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>A Woman Killed with Kindness, edited by Brian Scobie (1985)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hitler, Adolf</td>
<td>Mein Kampf, translated by Ralph Manheim (1973)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Homer</td>
<td>The Iliiad, translated by E. V. Rieu (Harmondsworth, 1950)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The Odyssey, translated by E. V. Rieu (Harmondsworth, 1946)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hooker, Richard</td>
<td>The Works, arranged by J. Keeble, revised by R. W. Church and F. Paget (Oxford, 1888)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Author</td>
<td>Title and Details</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>---------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Poems, edited by George Burke Johnston (1954)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Sejanus, edited by F. W. Bolton (1966)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Selected Masques, edited by Stephen Orgel (1970)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kyd, Thomas</td>
<td>The Spanish Tragedy, edited by Philip Edwards (Manchester, 1959)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lodge, Thomas</td>
<td>An Alarvm against Vswers. Containing tryed experiences against worldly abuses (1584)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Machiavelli, Niccolò</td>
<td>The Prince, translated and edited by Peter Bondanella and Mark Musa (Oxford, 1984)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The levv of Malta (1633)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marston, John</td>
<td>The Plays, edited by H. Harvey Wood, 3 vols (1934)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marvell, Andrew</td>
<td>The Poems, edited by Hugh McDonald (1972), first published 1952</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Meres, Francis</td>
<td>Palladis Tamia. Wits Treasvry, (1598)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Middleton, Thomas
The Works, edited by A. H. Bullen, 8 vols (New York, 1964)

Milton, John

____________
The Poems, edited by John Carey and Alistair Fowler (1968)

____________

Montaigne, Michel
The Essayes, translated by John Florio, 3 vols (1904)

More, Thomas

Nabbes, Thomas
Microcosmus, A Morall Maske (1637)

Ovid
The Metamorphoses, translated by Mary M. Innes (Harmondsworth, 1955)

Percy, Thomas

Prynne, William
Histrio-mastix. The Players Scovrge or Actors Tragaedie (1633)

Puttenham, George

Rainoldes, John
Th'Overthrow of Stage-Playes (Oxford, 1599)

Ralegh, Walter
Selected Writings, edited by Gerald Hammond (Harmondsworth, 1986), first published 1984

Rankins, Wil.
Mirrovr of Monsters: Wherein is plainly described the manifold vices & sported enormities, that are caused by the infectious sight of Playes, with the description of the subtile slights of Sathan, making them his instruments (1587)

Rushdie, Salman
The Satanic Verses (1988)

Shakespeare, William
Antony and Cleopatra, edited by Emrys Jones (Harmondsworth, 1977)
The Complete Works, edited by Peter Alexander (1951)

Cymbeline, edited by John Wilders (1983)

Measure for Measure, edited by J. W. Lever (1965)

Measure for Measure, edited by N. W. Bawcutt (Oxford, 1991)

The Merchant of Venice, edited by John Russell Brown (1959)

Romeo and Juliet, edited by Brian Gibbons (1980)

The Sonnets and A Lover's Complaint, edited by John Kerrigan (Harmondsworth, 1986)

Troilus and Cressida, edited by Kenneth Muir (Oxford, 1982)

The Two Gentlemen of Verona, edited by Kurt Schlueter (Cambridge, 1990)

Sidney, Philip

An Apology for Poetry, edited by Geoffrey Shepherd (Manchester, 1965)

Smith, Henrie

The Sermons of Master Henrie Smith, gathered into one volume. Printed according to his corrected copies in his lifetime (1592)

Spenser, Edmund

The Faerie Queene, edited by A. C. Hamilton (1977)

Stow, John

A Suruay of London (1598)

A Suruay of London (1603)

Stubbes, Phillip

The Anatomie of Abuses: Contayning a Discoverie or Brief Summarie of such Notable Vices and Imperfections, as now raigne in many Christian Countreyes of the Worlde: but (especiallie) in a verie famous Ilande called AILGNA: Together, with most fearefull Examples of Gods Judgements, executed vpon the wicked for the same, aswell in AILGNA of late, as in other places, elsewhere. Very Godly, to be read of all true Christians euerie where: but most needefull, to be regarded in ENGLAND (1583)

The Second part of the Anatomie of Abuses, containing The display of Corruptions, with a perfect de-scription of such imperfections, blemishes and abuses, as now reigning in euerie degree, require reformation for feare of Gods vengeance to be powred vpon the people and countrie, without speedie repentance and conuersion vnto God (1583)

Vaughan, Henry

The Complete Poetry, edited by French Fogle (New York, 1964)
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Work</th>
<th>Translator/Editor</th>
<th>Publisher/Year</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Vergil</td>
<td>The Aeneid, translated by Robert Fitzgerald</td>
<td>Harmondsworth, 1985</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The Georgics, translated by Robert Wells</td>
<td>Manchester, 1982</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The Pastoral Poems, translated by E. V. Rieu</td>
<td>Harmondsworth, 1949</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Secondary Sources

Unless otherwise stated the place of publication of books is London

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author(s)</th>
<th>Title and Details</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>et al.</td>
<td>'Feminist Criticism', PMLA, 104 (1989), 77 - 78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>'Male Bonding in Shakespeare's Comedies', in Shakespeare's Rough Magic, edited by Peter Erickson and Coppélia Kahn (1985), 73 - 103</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Suffocating Mothers: Fantasies of Maternal Origin in Shakespeare's Plays, Hamlet to The Tempest (1992)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Adler, Doris</td>
<td>'Imaginary Toads in Real Gardens', English Literary Renaissance, 11 (1981), 235 - 260</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aers, Lesley and Nigel Wheale (eds)</td>
<td>Shakespeare in the Changing Curriculum (1991)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aers, Lesley</td>
<td>'Shakespeare in the National Curriculum', in Shakespeare in the Changing Curriculum, edited by Lesley Aers and Nigel Wheale (1991), 30 - 39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Allen, Bob</td>
<td>'A School Perspective on Shakespeare Teaching', in Shakespeare in the Changing Curriculum, edited by Lesley Aers and Nigel Wheale (1991), 40 - 57</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alpers, Paul</td>
<td>'What is Pastoral?', Critical Inquiry, 8 (1982), 437 - 460</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Alvarez, A.
'Thomas Carew and the "Harmlesse Pastimes" of Caroline Peace', Philological Quarterly, 62 (1983), 201 - 219

Aylmer, G. E.

Baltrušaitis, Jurgis
Anamorphic Art, translated by W. J. Strachan (Cambridge, 1977)

Barber, C. L.

Barker, Francis

Barton, Anne
Ben Jonson, Dramatist (Cambridge, 1984)

Beauregard, David N.
'Venus and Adonis: Shakespeare's Representations of the Passions', Shakespeare Studies, 8 (1975), 83 - 98

Beaver, Harold

Belsey, Catherine
Critical Practice (1980)

Bercaw, Jenean
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Details</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Benjamin, Walter</td>
<td>Illuminations, edited by Hannah Arendt, translated by Harry John</td>
<td>(1973)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bennett, Joan</td>
<td>Five Metaphysical Poets (Cambridge, 1978), first published 1964</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bennett, Tony</td>
<td>Formalism and Marxism (1972)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1965)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>'Against the Sink-a-Pace: Sexual and Family Politics in *Much Ado</td>
<td>Shakespeare Quarterly, 33 (1982), 302 - 313</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>About Nothing*, Shakespeare Quarterly, 33 (1982), 302 - 313</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Berger, John</td>
<td>Ways of Seeing (1972)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bergeron, David M.</td>
<td>'The Restoration of Hermione in The Winter's Tale, in Shakespeare's</td>
<td>Romances Reconsidered, edited by Carol Kay McGinnis and Henry E.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1978), 125 - 133</td>
<td>Jacobs (1978), 125 - 133</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Shakespeare's Romances and the Royal Family (Laurence, Kansas,</td>
<td>1985)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>1985)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>published 1990</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Berry, Ralph</td>
<td>Shakespeare and Social Class (Atlantic Highlands, NJ, 1988)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Biggins, Denis</td>
<td>'Sexuality, Witchcraft and Violence in Macbeth, *Shakespeare</td>
<td>Studies, 8 (1975), 255 - 277</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Binns, J. W.

Bogdanov, Michael and Michael Pennington

Boose, Lynda E.

__________

Bradbrook, M. C.
Muriel Bradbrook on Shakespeare (Sussex and New Jersey, 1984)

Bradley, A. C.
Shakespearean Tragedy (1974), first published 1904

Bray, Alan
'Homosexuality and the Signs of Male Friendship in Elizabethan England', History Workshop, 29 (1990), 1 - 19

__________

Breasted, Barbara
'Comus and the Castlehaven Scandal', Milton Studies, 3 (1971), 207 - 224

Briggs, Julia
This Stage in Play World: English Literature and its Background 1580 - 1625 (Oxford, 1983)

Bristol, Michael D.

Brockbank, J. P.
'History and Historionics in Cymbeline', Shakespeare Survey, 11 (1958), 42 - 49

Brockbank, Philip (ed)
Players of Shakespeare (Cambridge, 1985)

Brown, John Russell
'The Politics of Shakespeare Production', Shakespeare Survey, 44 (1992), 91 - 104
Brown, Paul
"This thing of darkness I acknowledge mine": The Tempest and the Discourse of Colonialism', in Political Shakespeare: New Essays in Cultural Materialism, edited by Jonathan Dollimore and Alan Sinfield (Manchester, 1985), 48 - 71

Brown, Steve
'The Boyhood of Shakespeare's Heroines: Notes on Gender Ambiguity in the Sixteenth Century', Studies in English Literature, 30 (1990), 243 - 263

Bulman, James C.
The Merchant of Venice: Shakespeare in Performance (Manchester and New York, 1991)

——— and H. R. Coursen (eds)
Shakespeare on Television: An Anthology of Essays and Reviews (1988)

Bush, Douglas

Butler, Martin
Theatre and Crisis 1632 - 1642 (Cambridge, 1984)

Calderwood, James L.
'Creative Uncreation in King Lear', Shakespeare Quarterly, 37 (1986), 5 - 19

Callaghan, Dympna
Women and Gender in Renaissance Tragedy: A Study of King Lear, Othello, The Duchess of Malfi and The White Devil (Hemel Hempstead, 1989)

Cantor, Paul A.
'Shakespeare's The Tempest: The Wise Man or Hero', Shakespeare Quarterly, 31 (1980), 64 - 75

Carey, John
Milton (1969)

———

Cartelli, Thomas

Carter, Angela

Charney, Maurice  'Jessica's Turquoise Ring and Abigail's Poisoned Porridge: Shakespeare and Marlowe as Rivals and Imitators', Renaissance Drama, 10 (1979), 33 - 44

Cohen, Walter  'The Merchant of Venice and the Possibilities of Historical Criticism', ELH, 49 (1982), 765 - 789

Cole, Douglas  'Shakespearean Pastoral', Renaissance Drama, 5 (1972), 213 - 224

———  Making a Match: Courtship in Shakespeare and His Society (Princeton, 1991)

Cook, Carol  "'The Sign and Semblance of Her Honour": Reading Gender Difference in Much Ado About Nothing*, PMLA, 101 (1986), 186 - 202

Cooper, Helen  Pastoral: Medieval into Renaissance (Ipswich and Totowa, 1977)

———  'Location and Meaning in Masque, Morality and Royal Entertainment', in The Court Masque, edited by David Lindley (Manchester, 1984), 135 - 148
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Publication Details</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Coursen, H. R.</td>
<td>Shakespearean Performance as Interpretation</td>
<td>(1992)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Creaser, John</td>
<td>'Milton's Comus: The Irrelevance of the Castlehaven Scandal', Notes and Queries, 229 (1984), 307 - 317</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cunningham, Delora</td>
<td>'The Jonsonian Masque as a Literary Form', English Language Notes, 22 (1955), 108 - 124</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>'Wonder and Love in the Romantic Comedies', Shakespeare Quarterly, 35 (1984), 262 - 266</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Curtius, Ernst Robert</td>
<td>European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, translated by Willard R. Trask (1979)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Danson, Lawrence N.</td>
<td>'Metonymy and Coriolanus Philological Quarterly*, 52 (1973) 30 - 42</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>'Christopher Marlowe: The Questioner', English Literary Renaissance, 12 (1982) 3 - 29</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Davies, H. Neville</td>
<td>'Jacobean Antony and Cleopatra', Shakespeare Studies, 17 (1985), 123 - 158</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Davies, Stevie</td>
<td>The Idea of Woman in Renaissance Literature: The Feminine Reclaimed (Brighton, 1986)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Diehl, Huston</td>
<td>'The Iconography of Violence in English Renaissance Tragedy', Renaissance Drama, 11 (1980), 27 - 44</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Sexual Dissidence: Augustine to Wilde, Freud to Foucault (Oxford, 1991)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>'Shakespeare Cultural Materialism, Feminism and Marxist Humanism', New Literary History, 21 (1990), 471 - 493</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>and Alan Sinfield (eds)</td>
<td>Political Shakespeare: New Essays in Cultural Materialism (Manchester, 1985)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
and Alan Sinfield

Drakakis, John (ed)

Alternative Shakespeares (1985)

________ (ed)

Shakespearean Tragedy (1992)

Duplessis, Rachel Blau

'Washing Blood', Feminist Studies, 4 (1978), 1 - 12

Dutton, Richard

Ben Jonson: To the First Folio (Cambridge, 1983)

________

Eagleton, Terry

Marxism and Literary Criticism (1976)

________

'Ideology and Scholarship', in Historical Studies and Literary Criticism, edited by Jerome J. McGann (1985), 114 - 125

________

Elam, Kier

The Semiotics of Theatre and Drama (1980)

________

Shakespeare's Universe of Discourse: Language Games in the Comedies (Cambridge, 1984)

Elsom, John (ed)

Empson, William

________

Some Versions of Pastoral (1986), first published 1935

Engle, Lars

"'Thrift is Blessing'": Exchange and Explanation in The Merchant of Venice, Shakespeare Quarterly, 37 (1986), 20 - 37

Erickson, Peter

'Rewriting the Renaissance, Rewriting Ourselves', Shakespeare Quarterly 38 (1987), 327 - 337

________

Estrin, Barbara L.

'Romeo, Juliet and the Art of Naming Love', Ariel, 12 (1981), 31 - 49
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Work</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Ettin, Andrew V.</td>
<td>Literature and the Pastoral (1984)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fenn, W. W.</td>
<td>'Shakespeare and the Art of Painting', Magazine of Art (1889), 202 - 205</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fitz, L. T.</td>
<td>'The Vocabulary of the Environment in The Tempest', Shakespeare Quarterly, 26 (1975), 42 - 47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>'Egyptian Queen and Male Reviewers: Sexist Attitudes in Antony and Cleopatra, Shakespeare Quarterly, 28 (1977), 297 - 316</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fone, Byrne R. S.</td>
<td>'This Other Eden: Arcadia and the Homosexual Imagination', in Literary Visions of Homosexuality, edited by Stuart Kellogg (New York, 1983), 13 - 34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Foster, Donald W.</td>
<td>'Macbeth's War on 'Time', English Literary Renaissance, 16 (1986), 319 - 342</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Foucault, Michel</td>
<td>Madness and Civilisation: A History of Insanity in the Age of Reason, translated by Richard Howard (1967)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
"Leud Priapians" and Renaissance Pornography', Studies in English Literature, 12 (1972) 157 - 172

'The Nature of Portia's Victory: Turning to Men in The Merchant of Venice, Shakespeare Survey, 37 (1984), 55 - 68

Renaissance Bodies: The Human Figure in English Culture (1990)

Exile and Change in Renaissance Literature (1984)

The Curious Perspective: Literary and Pictorial Wit in the Seventeenth Century (1978)

Gohlke, Madelon

Goldberg, Jonathan

Goldberg
n

Gordon, D. J.
The Renaissance Imagination, edited by Stephen Orgel (1975)

Gorfain, Phyllis
'Puzzle and Artifice: The Riddle as Metapoetry in Pericles', Shakespeare Survey, 29 (1976), 11 - 20

Green, William
'Humours, Characters and Attributive Names in Shakespeare's Plays', Names, 20 (1972), 157 - 165

Greenblatt, Stephen J.
Learning to Curse: Essays in Early Modern Culture (1990)

Gurr, Andrew
The Shakespearean Stage, 1574 - 1642, second edition (Cambridge, 1980)

'Habicht, Werner
'Shakespeare and Theatre Politics in the Third Reich', in The Play Out of Context: Transferring Plays from Culture to Culture, edited by Hanna Scolnicot and Peter Holland (Cambridge, 1989), 110 - 120

Hallet, Charles A. and Elaine S. Hallett
Analyzing Shakespeare's Action: Scene Versus Sequence (Cambridge, 1991)

Hampton, Christopher
The Ideology of the Text (Milton Keynes, 1990)
Hasler, Jorg

Hawkes, Terence

Hawkins, Harriet
Classics and Trash: Traditions and Taboos in High Literature and Popular Modern Genres (Hemel Hempstead, 1990)

Healy, Thomas

Heath, Stephen
The Sexual Fix (1982)

Hebdige, Dick
Subculture: The Meaning of Style (1979)

Hervey, Mary F. S.
Holbein’s Ambassadors: The Picture and The Men (1900)

Hill, Christopher
The Collected Essays, 3 vols (Brighton, 1985 - 86)

-----------
Milton and The English Revolution (1977)

-----------

-----------
'Society and Andrew Marvell', in Marvell: Modern Judgements, edited by Michael Wilding (1969), 65 - 72

-----------
Society and Puritanism in Pre-Revolutionary England (1966)

-----------
The World Turned Upside Down (1984)

Hill, James L.
"'What, are they children?' Shakespeare’s Tragic Women and the Boy Actors', Studies in English Literature, 26 (1986), 235 - 258

Hill, R. F.
'Dramatic Techniques and Interpretation in Richard II', in Early Shakespeare, edited by John Russell Brown and Bernard Harris (1961), 101 - 121
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Secondary Source</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Hilton, Julian</td>
<td>Performance (1987)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hobby, Elaine</td>
<td>&quot;'My affection hath an unknown bottom&quot;: homosexuality and the teaching of As You Like It', in Shakespeare and the Changing Curriculum, edited by Lesley Aers and Nigel Wheale (1991), 125 - 142</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Holderness, Graham</td>
<td>'Agincourt 1944: Readings in the Shakespeare Myth', Literature and History, 10 (1984), 24 - 45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>&quot;'Come in Equivocator&quot;: Tragic Ambivalence in Macbeth', in Critical Essays on Macbeth, edited by Linda Cookson and Bryan Loughrey (Harlow, Essex, 1988), 61 - 71</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Hamlet (Milton Keynes, 1987)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Shakespeare's History (Dublin and New York, 1985)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>'Shakespeare and heritage', Textual Practice, 6 (1992), 247 - 263</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>(ed) The Shakespeare Myth (Manchester, 1988)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>and Bryan Loughrey</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Holland, Norman N.</td>
<td>'Caliban's Dream', Psychoanalytic Quarterly, 37 (1968), 114 - 125</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The Figure of Echo: A Mode of Allusion in Milton and After (1984), first published 1964</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Author</td>
<td>Title</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>---------------------</td>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hughes, Geoffrey</td>
<td>Swearing: A Social History of Foul Language, Oaths and Profanity in English (Oxford, 1991)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hulse, S. Clark</td>
<td>'Shakespeare's Myth of Venus and Adonis', PMLA, 93 (1978), 95 - 105</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>'Recent Studies of Literature and Painting in the English Renaissance', English Literary Renaissance, 15 (1985), 122 - 140</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Humphreys, Arthur</td>
<td>'The Jew of Malta and The Merchant of Venice: Two Readings of Life', Huntingdon Library Quarterly, 50 (1987), 279 - 294</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hutchings, W.</td>
<td>&quot;'Exits and Entrances&quot;: Ways in and out of Arden', Critical Quarterly, 21 (1979), 3 - 16</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jackson, Russell</td>
<td>Players of Shakespeare 2 (Cambridge, 1988)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>and Robert Smallwood (eds)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Johnson, Paula</td>
<td>'Carew's &quot;A Rapture&quot;: The Dynamics of Fantasy', Studies in English Literature, 16 (1976), 145 - 155</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Jones, Ernest

Jones, Gemma
'Hermione', in Players of Shakespeare, edited by Philip Brockbank (Cambridge, 1985), 153 - 165

Kamps, Ivo (ed)
Shakespeare Left and Right (1991)

Kastan, David Scott and Peter Stallybrass (eds)
Staging the Renaissance: Reinterpretations of Elizabethan and Jacobean Drama (1991)

Kaufman, Michael W.
'Spare Ribs: The Conception of Women in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance', Soundings, 56 (1973), 139 - 163

Kavanagh, James H.
'Shakespeare in Ideology', in Alternative Shakespeares, edited by John Drakakis (1985), 144 - 165

Keach, William
Elizabethan Erotic Narrative: Irony and Pathos in the Ovidian Poetry of Shakespeare, Marlowe and Their Contemporaries (Horsham, Sussex, 1977)

Keast, William R. (ed)
Seventeenth Century English Poetry: Modern Essays in Criticism (1971)

Keifer, Frederick
'Love Letters in The Two Gentlemen of Verona', Shakespeare Studies, 18 (1986), 65 - 86

Kermode, Frank
'Dissociation of Sensibility', The Kenyon Review, 19 (1957), 169 - 194

___________ (ed)
English Pastoral Poetry: From the Beginning of Marvell (1952)

Kimbrough, Robert

Kitch, M. J. (ed)

Kleinburg, Seymour
Kökeritz, Helge 'Puning Names in Shakespeare', Modern Language Notes, 65 (1950), 240 - 243

Kristeva, Julia 'Romeo and Juliet: Love-hatred in the Couple', in Shakespearean Tragedy, edited by John Drakakis (1992), 296 - 315

Kronenfeld, Judy Z. 'Social Rank and the Pastoral Ideals of As You Like It', Shakespeare Quarterly, 29 (1978), 333 - 348

Kuriyama, Constance Brown 'The Mother of the World: A Psychoanalytic Interpretation of Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra', English Literary Renaissance, 7 (1977), 324 - 351

Law, R. A. 'On Certain Proper Names in Shakespeare', University of Texas Studies in English, 30 (1951), 61 - 65

Lawrence, Judiana 'Natural Bonds and Artistic Coherence in the Ending of Cymbeline', Shakespeare Quarterly, 35 (1984), 440 - 460

Lelyveld, Toby Shylock on the Stage (1961)

Lever, J. W. The Tragedy of State (1971)

Levin, Harry Christopher Marlowe: The Overreacher (1954)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Title/Details</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Levin, Richard</td>
<td>'Feminist Thematics and Shakespearean Tragedy', PMLA, 103 (1988), 125 - 138</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Reply to Letter by Aldeman et al., PMLA, 104 (1989), 78 - 79</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Levine, Laura</td>
<td>'Men in Women's Clothing: Anti-theatricality and Effeminization from 1579 to 1642', Criticism, 28 (1986), 121 - 143</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lewis, C. S.</td>
<td>A Preface to Paradise Lost (Oxford, 1979), first published 1942</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lindley, David (ed)</td>
<td>The Court Masque, (Manchester, 1984)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Loeffelholz, Mary</td>
<td>'Two Masques of Ceres and Proserpine: Comus and The Tempest', in Re-Membering Milton, edited by Mary Nyquist and Margaret W. Ferguson (1988), 25 - 42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Longhurst, Derek</td>
<td>&quot;'Not for all time but for an Age': an approach to Shakespeare Studies', in Re-Reading English, edited by Peter Widdowson (1982), 150 - 163</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Loomba, Ania</td>
<td>Gender, Race, Renaissance Drama (Manchester, 1989)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maguin, Jean-Marie</td>
<td>'The Anagogy of Measure for Measure', Cahiers Elisabéthains, 16 (1979), 19 - 26</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maher, Mary Z.</td>
<td>'Hamlet's BBC Soliloquies', Shakespeare Quarterly, 36 (1985), 417 - 426</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mahood, M. M.</td>
<td>Shakespeare's Wordplay (1957)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marcus, Leah Sinonoglou</td>
<td>'Herrick's Noble Numbers and the Politics of Playfulness', English Literary Renaissance, 7 (1977), 108 - 126</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Marotti, Arthur F.  "'Love is not love': Elizabethan Sonnet Sequences and the Social Order', ELH, 49 (1982), 396 - 428

Marowitz, Charles  Recycling Shakespeare (1991)

Maslen, Elizabeth  'Yorick's Place in Hamlet', Essays and Studies, 36 (1983), 1 - 13

Maus, Katharine Eisaman  'Horns of Dilemma: Jealousy, Gender, And Spectatorship in English Renaissance Drama', ELH, 54 (1987), 561 - 583

Moi, Toril  Sexual/Textual Politics: Feminist Literary Theory (1985)

Moisan, Thomas  "'Which is the merchant here? and which the Jew?': subversion and recuperation in The Merchant of Venice', in Shakespeare Reproduced: The Text in History and Ideology, edited by Jean E. Howard and Marion F. O'Connor (1990), first published 1987, 188 - 206

Montrose, Louis Adrian  "'Eliza, Queene of Shepheardes" and the Pastoral of Power', English Literary Renaissance, 10 (1980), 153 - 182

Moretti, Franco  Signs Taken for Wonders: Essays in the Sociology of Literary Forms (1983)

Morris, Harry  'As You Like It: Et in Arcadia Ego', Shakespeare Quarterly, 26 (1975), 269 - 275
Morris, Helen 'Queen Elizabeth I Shadowed in Cleopatra', Huntingdon Library Quarterly, 32 (1968 - 9), 271 - 278

Muir, Kenneth 'Male as Female on Shakespeare's Stage', in Essays on Shakespeare in Honour of A. A. Ansari, edited by T. R. Sharma (Meerut, 1986), 1 - 7

Mulryne, Ronnie and Margaret Shewring The Golden Round: The Royal Shakespeare Company at The Swan (Stratford-on-Avon, 1989)

MacCabe, Colin 'Abusing the self and others: puritan accounts of the Shakespearian stage', Critical Quarterly, 30 (1988), 3 - 17

McLean, Ian The Renaissance Notion of Woman: A Study in the Fortunes of Scholasticism and Medical Science in European Intellectual Life (Cambridge, 1980)

McElroy, John F. 'Repetition, Contrariety, and Individualization in Edward II', Studies in English Literature, 24 (1984), 205 - 224

McGinnis, Carol Kay and Henry E. Jacobs (eds) Shakespeare's Romances Reconsidered (1978)

---

McManaway, James G. (ed) Shakespeare 400: Essays by American Scholars on the Anniversary of the Poet's Birth (1964)

Neely, Carol Thomas Broken Nuptuals in Shakespeare's Plays (1985)

---

'Contracting the Subject: Feminist Practice and New Renaissance Discourses', English Literary Renaissance, 18 (1988), 5 - 18

Nevo, Ruth

Comic Transformations in Shakespeare (1980)

Norbrook, David

'Verse Reformation of the Masque', in The Court Masque, edited by David Lindley (Manchester, 1984), 94 - 110

Normand, Lawrence

'Veading the Body in The Merchant of Venice, Textual Practice, 5 (1991), 55 - 73

Novy, Marianne

Nyquist, Mary and Margaret W. Ferguson

Orgel, Stephen

The Illusion of Power, (1975)

Inigo Jones: The Theatre of the Stuart Court, 2 vols (1973)

The Jonsonian Masque (Cambridge, Mass., 1965)

'Veobody's Perfect: Or Why Did the English Stage Take Boys for Women?', The South Atlantic Quarterly, 88 (1989), 7 - 29

'The Renaissance Artist as Plagiarist', ELH, 48 (1981), 476 - 495

Ornstein, Robert

A Kingdom for a Stage: The Achievement of Shakespeare's History Plays (Cambridge, Mass., 1972)

Oz, Avraham

Parfitt, G. A. E.

Parker, Patricia

'Eve, Evening and the Labour of Reading in Paradise Lost', English Literary Renaissance, 9 (1979), 319 - 342

Literary Fat Ladies, Rhetoric, Gender, Property (1987)

Shakespeare and the Question of Theory (1991), first published 1985

Parker, William Riley

Parry, Graham

The Golden Age Restor'd: The Culture of the Stuart Court, 1603 - 42 (Manchester, 1981)

Parry, P. H.

'The Boyhood of Shakespeare's Heroines', Shakespeare Survey, 42 (1990), 99 - 109

Patrides, C. A.

Approaches to Marvell (1978)

Pastoral and Ideology: Virgil to Valery (Oxford, 1988)

Paul, Henry N.

Payne, Michael

'Erotic Irony and Polarity in Antony and Cleopatra', Shakespeare Quarterly, 24 (1973), 265 - 279

Pearl, Sara

'Sounding to present occasions: Jonson's Masques of 1620 - 5', in The Court Masque, edited by David Lindley (Manchester, 1984) 60 - 77
Pequigney, Joseph
Such is My Love: A Study of Shakespeare's Sonnets (1985)

Perrett, Marion D.
'Shakespeare and Anti-Semitism: Two Television Versions of The Merchant of Venice', in Shakespeare on Television: An Anthology of Essays and Reviews, edited by J. C. Bulman and H. R. Coursen (1988), 156 - 168

Phillips, James E.

Plottel, Jeanine Pansier
'Anamorphosis in Painting and Literature', Yearbook of Comparative and General Literature, 28 (1979), 10 - 19

Poggioli, Renato
The Oaten Flute: Essays on Pastoral Poetry and the Pastoral Ideal (Cambridge, Mass., 1975)

Pope-Hennessy, John
Cellini (1985)

Porter, Joseph A.
'Marlowe, Shakespeare, and the Canonisation of Heterosexuality', The South Atlantic Quarterly, 88 (1989), 127 - 147

Proudfoot, Richard

Prudhomme, Danièle
'The Reformation and the Decline of Anti-Judaism', Cahiers Elisabéthains, 26 (1984), 3 - 13

Rackin, Phyllis

Rebhorn, Wayne A.
'Mother Venus: Temptation in Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis', Shakespeare Studies, 11 (1978), 1 - 19
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Rinehart, Keith</td>
<td>'Shakespeare's Cleopatra and England's Elizabeth', Shakespeare Quarterly, 23 (1972), 81 - 86</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rivers, Isabel</td>
<td>Classical and Christian Ideas in English Renaissance Poetry (1979)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rose, Mary Beth</td>
<td>The Expense of Spirit: Love and Sexuality in English Renaissance Drama (1988)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ryan, Kiernan</td>
<td>Shakespeare (Hemel Hempstead, 1989)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saccio, Peter</td>
<td>Shakespeare's English Kings: History, Chronicle and Drama (1977)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saslow, James M.</td>
<td>Ganymede In the Renaissance: Homosexuality in Art and Society (1986)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Schafer, E.</td>
<td>'The Orthography of Proper Names', Studies in Bibliography, 23 (1970), 1 - 19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Author</td>
<td>Title</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------------------</td>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>'Shakespeare through Contemporary Psychoanalysis', in Representing Shakespeare, edited by Murray M. Schwartz and Coppélia Kahn (1980), 21 - 33</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scragg, Leah</td>
<td>'The Shakespearean Antonio', English Language Notes, 23 (1985-6), 8 - 19</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Selden, Raman</td>
<td>'King Lear and True Need', Shakespeare Studies, 129 (1987), 143 - 169</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>A Reader's Guide to Contemporary Literary Theory (Brighton, 1985)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The Theory of Criticism: From Plato to the Present (1988)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shapiro, James</td>
<td>Shakespeare and the Jews (Southampton, 1992)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>&quot;'Which is The Merchant here, and which The Jew?&quot;: Shakespeare and the Economics of Influence', Shakespeare Studies, 20 (1988), 269 - 279</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shapiro, Michael</td>
<td>'Lady Margaret Wroth Describes a &quot;Boy Actress&quot;', Medieval and Renaissance Drama in England, 4 (1989), 187 - 194</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Shell, Marc
'The Wether and the Ewe: Verbal Usury in The Merchant of Venice', Kenyon Review, (1979), 65 - 92

Shepherd, Simon
Marlowe and the Politics of Elizabethan Theatre (Brighton, 1986)

Shickman, Alan
'Shakespeare's Private Drawer: Shakespeare and homosexuality', in The Shakespeare Myth, edited by Graham Holderness (Manchester, 1988), 96 - 110

Showalter, Elaine
'What's so funny about ladies' tailors? A survey of some male (homo)sexual types in the Renaissance', Textual Practice, 6 (1992), 17 - 30

Shugg, Wallace
'Prostitution in Shakespeare's London', Shakespeare Studies, 10 (1977), 291 - 313

Siemon, James Edward
'Noble Virtue in Cymbeline', Shakespeare Survey, 29 (1976), 51 - 61

Sinfield, Alan

Skura, Meredith

Slights, Camille Wells
'The Two Gentlemen of Verona and the Courtesy Book Tradition', Shakespeare Studies, 16 (1983), 13 - 31

Smallwood, R. L. 'Tis Pity She's a Whore and Romeo and Juliet, Cahiers Elisabéthains, 20 (1981), 49 - 70

Smith, Irwin 'Ariel and the Masque in The Tempest', Shakespeare Quarterly, 21 (1970), 213 - 222

Snyder, Susan 'Patterns of Motion in Antony and Cleopatra', Shakespeare Survey, 33 (1980), 113 - 122

Stallybrass, Peter 'Patriarchal Territories: The Body Enclosed', in Rewriting the Renaissance: The Discourse of Sexual Difference in Early Modern Europe, edited by Margaret W. Ferguson et al. (1986), 123 - 142

Stehling, Thomas 'To Love a Medieval Boy', in Literary Visions of Homosexuality, edited by Stuart Kellogg (New York, 1983), 151 - 170

Strong, Roy Art and Power (Woodbridge, Suffolk, 1984)

__________ Portraits of Elizabeth I (Oxford, 1963)

__________ The Renaissance Garden in England (1979)

and Carolyn Merlo
'Shakespeare and Pictorial Art', Bulletin of Bibliography, 40 (1983), 108 - 112

Suhamy, Henri

Summers, Joseph H.

Sutherland, John

Sutherland, Sarah P.
Masques in Jacobean Tragedy (New York, 1983)

Swan, Jim

Talbert, Ernest William
'The Interpretation of Jonson's Courtly Spectacles', PMLA, 61 (1946) 454 - 473

Tayler, Edward William
Nature and Art in Renaissance Literature (1964)

Taylor, Gary
Reinventing Shakespeare (1990)

Taylor, Michael

Tennenhouse, Leonard

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Title and Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Thomas, Keith</td>
<td>'Plotting the Early Comedies', Shakespeare Survey, 37 (1984), 13 - 22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Toliver, Harold</td>
<td>Pastoral Forms and Attitudes (Berkeley, 1971)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Traub, Valerie</td>
<td>Desire and Anxiety: Circulations of Sexuality in Shakespearean Drama (1992)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Traversi, Derek</td>
<td>Shakespeare: From Richard II to Henry V (1957)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trickett, Rachel</td>
<td>'Shakespeare and Milton', Essays and Studies, 31 (1978), 23 - 35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turner, Paul</td>
<td>'Woman and the Fall of Man', English Studies, 29 (1948), 1 - 18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Verch, Maria</td>
<td>'The Merchant of Venice on the German Stage since 1945', Theatre History Studies, 1985, 84 - 94</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Voss, James  ‘Edward II: Marlowe’s Historical Tragedy’, English Studies, 63 (1982), 517 - 530

Warren, Roger  Staging Shakespeare’s Late Plays (Oxford, 1990)

Wells, Robin Headlam  Shakespeare, Politics and the State (1986)

Wheeler, Richard  "Since first we were dissevered": Trust and Autonomy in Shakespearean Tragedy and Romance’, in Representing Shakespeare, edited by Murray M. Schwartz and Coppélia Kahn (1980), 150 - 169
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Work</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Whigham, Frank</td>
<td>'Ideology and Class Conduct in The Merchant of Venice', Renaissance Drama, 10 (1979), 93 - 115</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wickham, Glynne</td>
<td>'Masque and anti-masque in The Tempest, Essays and Studies, 28 (1975), 1 - 14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, Raymond</td>
<td>The Country and The City (1985), first published 1973</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williamson, Marilyn L.</td>
<td>'Romeo and Death', Shakespeare Studies, 14 (1981), 129 - 138</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Young, David

The Heart's Forest: A Study of Shakespeare's Pastoral Plays (1972)

Ziegler, Georgianne

'Where the Bee Sucks: A Triangular Study of Dr Faustus, The Alchemist and The Tempest, in Shakespeare's Romances Reconsidered, edited by Carol Kay McGinnis and Henry E. Jacobs (1978), 149 - 166

Ziegler, Georgianne

'My Lady's Chamber: Female Space, Female Chastity in Shakespeare, Textual Practice, 4 (1990), 73 - 90